SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 12, 1915.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we come to Thee day by day to settle those eternal issues before we turn our thought and effort to solve the problems that can last but a day. We come to ask for the grace that can alone come from Thee, and for that authority that Thou dost give which will justify Thy servants saying to the people through the law they make, Thou shalt or thou shalt not. Grant us obedience to the Divine will. May we ever turn to Thee for guidance and for instruction. We bless Thee for that marvelous Providence that has surrounded us as a nation.

To-day our minds turn back to one of the great beacon lights of our national history, our first martyred President. We bless Thee for the strength of that stalwart life and character, and pray that to-day under the inspiration of his life we may meet the challenge of this hour, and with malice toward none, with charity to all, with firmness in the right as God gives us to see the right, may we strive to finish the work that has been committed to us. May we lead on to the further victories of peace and prosperity. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I have an editorial from the Burlington (Vt.) Free Press of February 8. I ask unanimous consent to have it inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like——

Mr. THOMAS. It relates to the pending bill—the shipping bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to ask the Senator the subject of the editorial.

Mr. THOMAS. It relates to the bill, and is in favor of it.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, on this side we can not hear one word said by the Senator from Colorado.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not know whence comes the confusion, but the Chair knows it is here. The Senator from Colorado has asked permission to have inserted in the RECORD an editorial from the Burlington (Vt.) Free Press.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What is the request, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request is to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Burlington (Vt.) Free Press.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, in order that the Detroit Free Press may not be discriminated against, I shall ask for the same courtesy after that is done.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection, if the Secretary will read the article at the desk.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not care to have it read, unless the Senator insists on it.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have the Secretary read the editorial.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course I am anxious that it should be read, but I do not wish to insist upon it if the Senate wants to take up something else.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to reading the editorial? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From the Burlington (Vt.) Free Press, February 8, 1915.]

OUR MERCHANT MARINE AND NAVAL PREPAREDNESS.

Few of the American people fully realize the extent to which we have allowed Great Britain, Germany, and other foreign countries to dominate our foreign trade through control of steamship lines. When we speak of a railroad owning its own coal mines we can readily see how it can discriminate against other coal mines to its own material advantage and profit. When it comes to steamship lines and the application of the same principle to ocean commerce we seem to become suddenly oblivious to the operations of one of the great laws of monopoly and trade.

According to Lloyd's Register for the year 1913, Great Britain and her colonies had 10,000 steamships, with a gross tonnage of 19,849,167. The United States had only 1,871 steamships, with a gross tonnage of 4,302,294. In other words, the United States had less than one-fifth of the number of steamships sailed under the British flag, with about one-quarter of the tonnage. Germany had 2,019 steamships, as compared with Uncle Sam's 1,871.

The total number of steamships and sailing vessels of Great Britain was 11,287, as compared with 3,400 in the United States, the total tonnage being 20,431,000 and 5,427,636, respectively. Germany's total number of steamships and sailing craft was 2,019, with a total tonnage of 5,082,000.

Great Britain completely overwhelmed American shipping, while Germany, with almost no seacoast worthy of the name, with a territory not so large as Texas, and with a population about half that of the United States, was able to send her ships into the waters of Greater New York, the American metropolis, and other American ports and beat us at our own game.

Nor should it be assumed that we were overtaking our foreign rivals. The British proportion of the total new merchant ships built during the year was 58 per cent of the whole world's output for the year, as compared with 60 per cent in 1912 and 68 per cent in 1911. Germany's proportion was 14 per cent, as compared with 13 per cent in 1912 and 9.7 per cent in 1911.

Uncle Sam's magnificent proportion of the new merchant marine of the world for the year was 8.3 per cent against Great Britain's 58, or less than one-seventh of John Bull's. Our proportion was 9.8 per cent in 1912 and 6.5 per cent in 1911, as compared with 8.3 in 1913, so that we lost in the year under consideration instead of gaining.

That is a sorry picture besides that painted for the future of America's merchant marine by the lamented President McKinley in his message to Congress on December 3, 1900, in which he said:

"Foreign ships should carry the least, not the greatest, part of American trade. The remarkable growth of our steel industries, the progress of shipbuilding for the domestic trade, and our steadily maintained expenditures for the Navy have created an opportunity to place the United States in the first rank of commercial maritime powers.

"Besides realizing a proper national aspiration, this will mean the establishment of a healthy growth along our coasts of a distinctive national industry, expanding the field for the profitable employment of labor and capital. It will increase the transportation facilities and reduce freight charges on the vast volume of products brought from the interior to the seaboard for export, and will strengthen the arm of national defense, upon which the founders of the Government and their successors have relied."

President Roosevelt in his message of 1901 said: "Shipping lines, if established to the principal countries with which we have dealings, would be of political as well as of commercial benefit. From every standpoint it is unwise for the United States to continue to rely upon ships of competing nations for the distribution of our goods."

The truths uttered in these presidential messages are axiomatic, being self-evident. How did we Republicans build up the American merchant marine when we had control of the National Government during the following years? We had prated in our platforms for decades about the American merchant marine, and yet in 1913, when we turned the control of the Federal Government over to our Democratic rivals, we could show only 9.8 per cent for the previous year of new merchant ships as compared with England's 60 per cent.

Nor was this falling off in American shipping wholly Republican, for the same thing happened under Cleveland. In 1892 American ships carried 12.3 per cent of our American exports; in 1896, when McKinley was elected, it had dropped to 12 per cent, and in 1903 under Roosevelt, despite presidential messages, American ships carried the ridiculously small part of 9.1 per cent of American exports.

Such figures as these are enough to bring the blush of shame to the cheek of every patriotic American.

In this connection the Republican pot can not call the Democratic kettle black. Both these great parties have allowed partisan politics to prevent this magnificent Nation from entering into its own on the sea, just as they are doing at the present time in Washington. Neither party in time of peace brought this Nation up to its merited place in maritime progress.

Republicans naturally are not anxious to see Democrats do something in that direction any more than they were eager to have Democrats tackle the currency and banking problem successfully.

When a great political party promises the people a needed reform or great public improvement and fails utterly to keep faith with the people, then it must expect to see the pent-up waters break around the dam or over it. A progressive nation must move forward.

It will be a political crime if the present opportunity to start a new move for a great American merchant marine is allowed to pass unimproved. The people will not hold the Republican Party guiltless, if it simply plays the dog in the manger and helps afford no solution of the problem.

Republicans are shouting for "military preparedness." That is well, but, as we have indicated, "naval preparedness" is a vastly greater necessity for the United States. As McKinley indicated, a merchant fleet is a national necessity: First, to furnish the reserve transports and supply ships necessary in war to supplement the Navy; second, to furnish the reserve trained seamen required to put the country on a war footing at sea.

Shall we have these for naval preparedness as well as American commerce now or shall we wait until Republicans can get into power and try to supply them three years hence when it may be too late? What is the answer of patriotism?

Mr. FLETCHER and Mr. SMITH of Michigan addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, some comment has been made about a public meeting at Faneuil Hall, and I desire to have read a telegram with reference to that meeting, also another telegram from the Marianna Commercial Club of Arkansas, and also a news item in this morning's Post, headed "Plan to seize trade." They are all very brief, and I should like to have them read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none and the Secretary will read.

The Secreary read as follows:

[Telegram.]

BOSTON, MASS., February 4, 1915.

WM. J. BRYAN,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

At public meeting in Faneuil Hall to-day resolution introduced to protest against shipping bill was declared by Mayor Curley unanimously carried. Resolution strongly denounced from floor. Nay vote not called. Much indignation among citizens. I believe sense of meeting was in favor of bill and against protesting resolutions.

WM. H. MCMASTERS.
WHITFIELD TUCK.

MARIANNA, ARK., February 11, 1915.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

We indorse the shipping bill and the determined stand of the Democratic Senators. It is in our judgment the greatest step that has been attempted to rehabilitate the American merchant marine as well as a measure of vital necessity to the United States. It is an opportunity that should not be lost. We urge the bill be enacted in preference to any legislation, regardless of whether such action may necessitate an extra session.

MARIANNA COMMERCIAL CLUB OF ARKANSAS.

PLAN TO SEIZE TRADE—ALLIES WILL INVADE GERMAN MARKETS IN SOUTH AMERICA—CHARTER SHIP FOR MISSION—ENGLISH AND FRENCH MERCHANTS TO TAKE SAMPLES OF WARES TO EXHIBIT AT PRINCIPAL LATIN-AMERICAN PORTS ON NINETY-DAY CRUISE—ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY TO MAKE TRIP.

LONDON, February 11, 1915.

An aggressive step in the direction of capturing trade heretofore held by Germany will be made at the beginning of April, when about 150 leaders of industry in England and France will proceed on a commercial mission to South America, taking with them a vast number of samples. The journey, which is to extend over 90 days, is being arranged by the Kelly Trading Co. A French vessel is being chartered and will start from Southampton.

SHIP TO CARRY WARES.

One of the organizers of the mission said:

"We mean to show Latin America the goods, and not merely talk to them. It is no use going out and telling the people there that we can give them as good articles as those made by Germans. We want to take the articles and show them and convince the people that the articles are not only good value but better for the money.

"The chambers of commerce and municipalities of South America will be visited and public meetings and receptions arranged. We have had applications from all sorts of industries for representatives to be sent on this voyage and have even had an inquiry about starting a new line of freight steamers. There will be about 100 Englishmen and 50 Frenchmen on the mission."

LINCOLN'S GETTYSBURG ADDRESS.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I desire to send to the Secretary's desk a very instructive editorial from the Detroit Free Press—it is not long—on the question now pending before the Senate.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Will the Senator permit a suggestion at this point, before the editorial to which he refers is read? It will only take a moment.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes, sir.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, this is the anniversary of the birth of Abraham Lincoln, and I think we might with propriety suspend our functions for a brief moment while one of our colleagues reads his Gettysburg speech. The Hon. BLAIR LEE, the Senator from Maryland, I think will be glad to perform that service. I ask, if there is no objection, that the Senator from Maryland be invited to read the address.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Maryland will read the address.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] has suggested that, as the representative of a Southern State, it would be appropriate for me to read Lincoln's Gettysburg Address. It is as follows:

Fourscore and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent a new Nation, conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal.

Now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that Nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated, can long endure. We are met on a great battle field of that war. We have come to dedicate a portion of that field as a final resting place for those who here gave their lives that that Nation might live. It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this.

But, in a larger sense, we can not dedicate, we can not consecrate, we can not hallow this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here have consecrated it far above our poor power to add or detract. The world will little note nor long remember what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us, the living, rather to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us—that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion; that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain; that this Nation under God shall have a new birth of freedom; and that government of the people, by the people, for the people shall not perish from the earth.

CLOTURE IN THE SENATE.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I ask that the editorial which I have sent to the desk may be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the reading of the editorial?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It relates to a very important matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am not going to object to the reading of this editorial, but I am going to object to the reading of any others. The idea of filling up the RECORD every morning with editorials of the newspapers of the country is an absurdity, and is being carried to an extent which makes the absurdity irksome.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From the Detroit Free Press, Thursday, Feb. 11, 1915.]

CLOTURE IN THE SENATE.

Again there is talk of cloture in the United States Senate. It is heard periodically, but it has always ended in talk. Unless the Democratic majority has utterly lost its foresight in the heat of dispute, it will end in talk this time, because the majority in our politics can never lose sight of the certainty that some day they will be the minority and the force they create for their own immediate ends in their day of power will return to plague them in their day of weakness. The reflection is the more likely to be potent now because the Democrats are fully aware that they are in control by accident—an influential consideration which the Republicans never felt, for they were always convinced that they would continue running things to the end of time.

It is highly probable that no senatorial majority in Washington ever seriously desired the cloture. It is probable, too, that the cloture is unnecessary in the American Senate. That body is small; it does not require the harsh rules which unwieldly houses must have in order to do business. The period of any filibuster in the Senate is limited by the inadequacy of material for a prolonged obstructive effort, the physical endurance of the relatively few men who can engage in the contest forbidding serious injury to the public business. If the minority in the lower House were to agree upon a campaign of dilatory tactics they could carry on a fight almost indefinitely, but the 43 Republicans in the Senate do not constitute an irresistible menace.

In any event there is no real cause for alarm in senatorial filibustering. No measure for which there is a genuine public demand could possibly be defeated by this method; in fact, no party that must seek popular favor would dare to resort to such tactics to thwart the popular will. It is only when the minority senses the support of the electorate under it that it ventures to enter upon a struggle of this kind. The fact that the ship-purchase fight could continue to the spectacular extent it has reached is enough to demonstrate the error that prompted the administration to force this measure on Congress to the exclusion of more appropriate legislation.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a clipping from a newspaper. I have no desire to impose upon the Senate the reading of any more editorials, but I wish to say that some days ago, when it was my privilege to make some few observations before this body, I was interrupted by a very delightful and distinguished Senator, the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], who asked if I did not know that a great meeting had been held in Faneuil Hall, Boston, that the Democratic mayor had presided, and that there had unanimously been passed resolutions in opposition to the shipping bill; and I remember he asked what I had to say about that. I replied that all I had to say was, "May God help him." Now, I have an explanation direct from Boston, the seat of learning and of wisdom, where the sun rises and sets—from the Boston Post of Friday, February 5, in which I find this:

DECLARE AGAINST SHIP BILL—BOTH PARTIES REPRESENTED AT FANEUIL HALL MEETING.

"All those in favor of these resolutions of protest against the ship-purchase bill say 'aye,'" shouted Mayor Curley, waving his gavel from the platform of Faneuil Hall yesterday afternoon, after he had made a final plea aimed to squelch any stray opposition.

A thunderous "aye" burst from the crowd of men and the few women who packed the chilly hall, where they had listened for more than an hour to speeches from Democrats and Republicans against the Wilson administration ship bill.

"UNANIMOUS VOTE."

Echoing the remark of the Senator from New Hampshire—

"The 'ayes' have it, and it's a unanimous vote," announced the mayor emphatically, at the top of his voice, whereupon he instantly dropped his gavel with a bang and walked from the rostrum.

"No, no, no!" protested Whitfield Tuck, of Winchester, as loudly as he could, indignant because the mayor had not called for the "nays." "I didn't think you'd do that, Mr. Mayor."

But it was done and the crowd departed. Mr. Tuck had voiced the only opposition to the protest resolutions, and he won cheers from some of the crowd when he said the United States was humiliated when 150,000 Americans were stranded in Europe by the war and we had no ships to bring them home. He was also applauded when he declared he knew as much about the ship bill as anyone on the platform except the mayor.

APPLAUSE FROM THE GALLERY.

"This whole proposition is against public ownership," said Mr. Tuck. "If we had had public ownership here, New England would not be in the condition it is under the New York, New Haven & Hartford."

"Who are you?" shouted a voice from the gallery after Mr. Tuck concluded.

"I'm Whitfield Tuck, of Winchester," he replied, willingly.

"Good for Tuck," came back the galleryite.

Mr. Tuck's opposition was of little avail against the sentiment of the crowd gathered in the hall and Mayor Curley's skillful leadership and oratory.

Because it had been planned out and plotted out by the men who are allied and bound heart, body, and soul against the interests of the people.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. I thought the Senator from New Jersey had concluded. Has the Senator concluded?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I have concluded for an interruption; yes. [Laughter.]

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, I want to say that in the statement I made the other day I did not state the exact facts. The action of the meeting was unanimous, except for Whitfield Tuck.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Does the Senator know that?

Mr. GALLINGER. I know it.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. How?

Mr. GALLINGER. Why, the Senator's own statement shows it.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. No; it does not show it.

Mr. GALLINGER. That Whitfield Tuck shouted "No, no, no!"

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Yes; Whitfield Tuck voiced the opposition, but through the gag methods and gag rule that had been adopted by that Boston meeting there was no chance for those whom Whitfield Tuck so ably represented.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have seen persons who were at that meeting, and there is no question that the result was the unanimous decision of that great meeting.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I call for the regular order.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Regular order!

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. This is very regular; I am trying to prove how unfair these men were in their opposition to the shipping bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is all out of order.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, at the proper time I will take occasion to state more definitely what happened.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This is all out of order.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Au revoir. [Laughter.]

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. OLIVER. I have here a short telegram from the president of the Second Division of the Railway Mail Association, which I ask to have read.

Mr. REED. I want to inquire if that is in the nature of a petition or memorial?

Mr. OLIVER. It is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. REED. I am going to object, unless it is in the nature of a petition or memorial.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, it is a telegram addressed to me in the nature of a petition relating to pending business.

Mr. REED. Is it addressed to Congress or to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. OLIVER. It is addressed to me.

Mr. REED. I object.

Mr. OLIVER. I will read the telegram.

Mr. REED. I call for the regular order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the telegram be read? All in favor will say "aye"; those opposed, "no." The Secretary will read the telegram.

Mr. REED. I should like to know how that got to be the question, however.

The VICE PRESIDENT. By the rules of the Senate, which provide that when the reading of a paper is asked for, and there is objection, the Chair shall immediately submit the question to the Senate; and if there be a majority in favor of it, the paper shall be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

ALLEGANY, N. Y., February 11, 1915.

Senator GEORGE T. OLIVER,
Washington, D. C.:

Seven hundred railway postal clerks of Pennsylvania ask you to oppose change from annual to biannual promotions.

J. F. BENNETT,
President Second Division, Railway Mail Association.

FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I wish to make an inquiry of the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. On yesterday the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] presented a joint resolution of the Iowa Legislature asking for an investigation of the Union Stockyards at Chicago, Ill., with reference to the foot-and-mouth disease. I should like to inquire what steps the subcommittee having this matter in charge have taken with reference to the proposed investigation?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Regular order, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order is called for.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I wish to read a copy of a telegram which has been sent to many Senators—to seven Senators at least—relating to pending legislation. The telegram reads:

As lifelong Democrats who rejoice in the several great constructive measures enacted by the present Congress, we commend every legitimate effort to defeat the Alexander shipping bill. Opposition to it deserves the gratitude of the entire Nation, in every section of which it is condemned by experienced business men, regardless of party, as well as by the people at large, who earnestly desire avoidance of all possible international friction. No more effective means could be devised for completely destroying private enterprise, upon which successful development of a wisely encouraged American merchant marine depends.

That telegram is signed by:

Robert M. Burnett, James M. Curley, Thomas B. Fitzpatrick, Jerome Jones, Geoffrey B. Lehy, Edward F. McSweeney, James J. Phelan, Bernard J. Rothwell, Joseph B. Russell, James J. Storrow, and John A. Sullivan.

It is noticeable that in this list of signers, all of whom are Democrats, and who include many of the leading Democrats of Massachusetts, is the mayor of Boston, James M. Curley; Edward F. McSweeney, president of the dock commissioners of Massachusetts; Bernard J. Rothwell, former president of the chamber of commerce; John A. Sullivan, a distinguished Democratic Member of Congress until recently; and Joseph B. Russell, who was nominated by the President for collector of the port of Boston, but who declined the appointment—I think the only instance of that kind that has happened during this administration.

ADDITIONAL JUDICIAL DISTRICT IN KANSAS.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I present a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Kansas and ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read the concurrent resolution, as follows:

House concurrent resolution 22.

Be it resolved by the house, the senate concurring therein:

Whereas there is a rumor, and newspaper publicity given, to the division of Kansas into two Federal judicial districts, and

Whereas the present court is up with its work and idle nearly one-half of the term, and is able to speedily reach all cases of an urgent nature, and

Whereas it is the belief of this body that, under existing conditions, the revenue of the Nation badly impaired, there is no necessity or need for the Nation to entail further expense by the establishment of another Federal court in the State of Kansas, but rather the strictest economy along all lines should be practiced not alone by the State, but by the Nation: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the establishment of another Federal court in Kansas is uncalled for and unnecessary and will add another burden to the taxation of the Nation, and that we are opposed to it along the lines suggested: be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to each Member of Congress from Kansas, including our United States Senators; also the Attorney General, and that a copy be furnished the President of the United States and to all of his Cabinet. The clerk of this house is hereby authorized and commanded to forward said copies upon the passage of same.

I hereby certify that the above concurrent resolution originated in the house and passed that body January 29, 1915.

ROBERT STONE,
Speaker of the House.
I. E. LAMBERT,
Chief Clerk of the House.

Passed the senate February 3, 1915.

W. U. MORGAN,
President of the Senate.
BURT E. BROWN,
Secretary of the Senate.

Approved February 5, 1915.

ARTHUR CAPPER, Governor.

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire to state that in one branch of the Kansas Legislature a majority of its members are Republican in politics, and the other branch is Democratic in politics. This resolution was passed by both bodies and is signed by the governor. I am myself in thorough accord with its declaration. There is no use of a second judicial district in Kansas, and there is not in many States that have two now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The concurrent resolution will be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

READING OF WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In conformity to the standing order of the Senate, the Chair appoints the junior Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] to read Washington's Farewell Address on the 22d day of February next.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Kansas, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House concurrent resolution 5.

Whereas times without number the great Missouri and Mississippi Valleys have been inundated, for the reason that the channels of these great rivers were not able to contain the deluge of waters that at certain seasons of the year are gathered from the immense watersheds of these rivers; and

Whereas the appeals of the thousands of people who inhabit these rich valleys have reached the Congress of these United States, and they have answered by pouring millions of dollars into the relief funds of these sections of the country; and

Whereas the relief thus offered and expended upon the channels of these rivers have been partially, if not wholly, inadequate to stop the ravages of these waters nor materially reduce the loss of life and property, which totals into the millions at each flood time, and thus the work of Congress seems to accomplish nothing and millions thus appropriated does not relieve pain and suffering or conserve the property as intended; and

Whereas the relief work carried on by the aid of the millions thus expended, as well as the preventatives thus far erected, has been wholly along the channels of said rivers without regard to source where the waters, or a large per cent of them, originate; and

Whereas about 300,000 square miles of the immense watersheds of these water courses is known as the semiarid belt of America, and that the rainfall in this section amounts to about 18 inches annually, usually fall in two or three months of the year, that the fall of land toward the rivers being from 7 to 10 feet to the mile, hurries the waters to the river channels at a time when local rainfall is all the channels can well carry; besides the rainy months of this semiarid district is usually when the winter snows of the mountains are melting rapidly and being hurried to the rivers; these combined circumstances, when conditions bring them together, always carry with them death and destruction, and we believe the ingenuity of man, with means at his command, is unable to build a channel sufficiently high and strong to cope with so formidable a foe.

At the same time that these waters are crossing, falling upon, and leaving this 300,000 square miles of semiarid country, it is leaving to be parched by the sun, a rich alluvial soil, capable of growing in abundance all of the Temperate Zone products, and the water passing on to carry destruction could most profitably be used in the dryer seasons of the year to temperate the excessive heat, water the thirsty vegetation, and moisten the fields of parching crops, as well as furnishing drink for man and beast.

If this water could be retained where it falls and the melting snows halted on their passage, a twofold purpose could be gained—that of lessening the burden of the river channels and the increasing of vegetation and crops in the semiarid belt. Thus the entire territory of the United States would be indirectly benefited and 40 per cent of its entire population directly helped; and

Whereas the State of Kansas contains 20,000 square miles of this semiarid territory, sparsely settled by thrifty, progressive American citizens, Kansans of grit and determination, true to their country, and loyal to their State. That this same territory is pleasing to the eye, attractive to the plowman, and full of productive qualities, lacking only water at the right time to make it the richest productive portion of our fair State, while the climate is healthy and invigorating; and

Whereas Kansas is ever ready and willing to step out in front and lead her neighbors to higher and better things, and her statesmen possess the wisdom and farsightedness to see that conservation of these waters, now not only wasted but actually the agency of destruction, but realizing the broad territory of the semiarid district makes it a National rather than a State question: Therefore be it

Resolved by the house of representatives, the senate concurring therein, That we urge the Members of Congress from our State to use every means in their power to bring this momentous question before the House and Senate; that they appoint a commission to investigate these facts; that thousands of dams be constructed in this district across the hundreds of draws, ravines, and rivers; that they be connected by canals and ditches, to the end that the melting snows of the mountains and the rains of the Great Plains be held in the territory where it is most needed.

That these resolutions be sent to all the States through which the Missouri and Mississippi Rivers pass and all the States which have any of the semiarid district within their borders, where the legislatures are now in session; that they be mailed to the speaker of the house and president of the senate of each State, asking that the resolutions be indorsed, and the Congressmen of the several States be requested to work for such laws and regulations as will bring about these dams and canals; and one copy to be mailed to the Speaker of the House of Congress and one copy to the President of the United States Senate and one copy to the Secretary of Agriculture.

I hereby certify that the above concurrent resolution originated in the house and passed that body January 29, 1915.

ROBERT STONE,
Speaker of the House.
I. E. LAMBERT,
Chief Clerk of the House.

Passed the senate February 3, 1915.

W. Y. MORGAN,
President of the Senate.
BURT. E. BROWN,
Secretary of the Senate.

Approved February 8, 1915.

ARTHUR CAPPER, Governor.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented the petition of John Kothenski, of Herminie, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation for the relief of the unemployed throughout the United States, and also for the establishment of free employment agencies, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented the petition of F. L. Doyle, of St. James, Mo., praying for the enactment of legislation to further amend the postal laws, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented petitions of citizens of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the exportation of ammunition, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I have a number of telegrams in the nature of memorials, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the appropriate committees.

There being no objection, the telegrams were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. O'GORMAN presented telegrams in the nature of memorials from sundry railway postal clerks of New York City, remonstrating against a change in the present system of promotion of postal clerks, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented memorials of the St. Raphael's Branch of the Holy Name Society, of New York City, N. Y., remonstrating against the conditions existing in Mexico, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of New York City, Glens Falls, Kingston, Buffalo, and Rochester, all in the State of New York, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the exportation of ammunition, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I have a communication from the president of the Railway Mail Clerks' Association of Connecticut, which is only two lines long. I ask to have the Secretary read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

89 SPRING STREET, NEW HAVEN CONN.,
February 11, 1915.

Senator FRANK B. BRANDEGEE,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: In behalf of the railway mail clerks of Connecticut, I beg that you will oppose the proposed change from annual to biennial promotions.

Respectfully,
JOHN E. BRENNAN,
President.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present resolutions of the Letter Carriers' Association of the Chicago Post Office, and ask that they be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Secretary read as follows:

GARDEN CITY BRANCH, No. 11,
NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF LETTER CARRIERS,
Chicago, February 8, 1915.

DEAR SIR: At a special meeting of the organization committee of Garden City Branch, No. 11, National Association of Letter Carriers, held Saturday evening, February 6, 1915, and attended by upward of 500 members, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted:

"Whereas the collectors of the city division of the post office in the city of Chicago (numbering 329 men) have been summoned before the superintendent of delivery of said division and informed that in the future collectors shall be paid $1,000 instead of $1,200, thereby illegally and ruthlessly setting aside an act of Congress which provides that all letter carriers are eligible to the higher grade, which is $1,200; and

"Whereas the law provides that charges must be preferred in writing, a copy of which must be presented to the accused, and a reasonable time allowed for defense before a reduction in salary is made; and

"Whereas we believe that Congress never contemplated that supervising officials should arbitrarily establish two grades of salaries in the carrier service, the highest grade of one to be $1,200 and the highest grade of the other to be $1,000, no matter what their alleged superior knowledge may be; and

"Whereas we believe that if in the interest of economy and reduction of expenses something should be done, the logical thing to do would be to start at the top and reduce the salaries of high-salaried officials (some of whom could be dispensed with altogether), and not attack the salaries of the men who do the hard work in the service, impairing in many cases their health thereby: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we vigorously protest against the action contemplated by the superintendent of delivery in the Chicago post office; and further be it

"Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to each of the 10 Congressmen and the two United States Senators from Illinois, and a copy be furnished the press of Chicago."

JAS. W. MURRAY, Secretary.

Mr. McLEAN presented petitions of Hermann Lodge, No. 13, O. D. H. S., of Middletown; of the Deutscher Krieger Verein, of New Britain; of the German Singing Society of Torrington; of the Club Vorwarts, of Middletown; of Gerstaecker Lodge, No. 96, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, of New Britain; of the Ansonia Maennerchor of Ansonia; of the Turn-Verein of Derby; of the Seimsieder Club, of New Britain; of Eintracht Rebekah Lodge, No. 19, of Meriden; of Anna Ottendorfer Lodge, No. 64, D. O. H., of Meriden; of Augusta Lodge, No. 2, O. D. H. S., of Meriden; of Eintracht Lodge, No. 1, O. D. H. S., of New Britain; and of sundry citizens of Torrington, Bakersville, Ansonia, Derby, Shelton, and Meriden, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the exportation of ammunition, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. OLIVER presented petitions of sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the exportation of ammunition, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to prohibit the present practice of issuing Government-stamped envelopes bearing printed return request, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to restrict the freedom of the press, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a memorial of the City Council of Pittston, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation to grant pensions to civil-service employees, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. BURLEIGH presented a petiton of the Ministers' Association, of Aroostook, Me., praying for the enactment of legislation to provide Federal censorship of motion-picture films, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. GRONNA. I present two telegrams, in the nature of memorials, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

There being no objection, the telegrams were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[Telegram.]

WATERTOWN, WIS., February 11, 1915.

Senator A. J. GRONNA,
Washington, D. C.:

Sixteen hundred railway postal clerks in the States of Wisconsin, Minnesota, North and South Dakota respectfully ask you to oppose amendment to existing law as proposed in House bill 19906 changing from annual to biennial promotions in the Postal Service.

W. M. COLLINS,
President Tenth Division, Railway Mail Association.

[Telegram.]

MINOT, N. DAK., February 11, 1915.

Hon. A. J. GRONNA,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.:

We respectfully ask you to use your influence against amendment to classification act of 1907 post-office bill.

CHARLES B. BURKE,
Secretary Branch No. 1152,
National Association of Letter Carriers.
LE ROY M. SWIGART,
Secretary Branch No. 1732,
United National Association Post-Office Clerks.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I present a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Arizona, favoring an appropriation for the construction of a bridge across the Gila River near the Pima Indian Agency, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House concurrent resolution for the construction of a bridge across the Gila River near the Pima Indian Agency.

To the Hon. MARCUS A. SMITH and HENRY F. ASHURST, United States Senators, and the Hon. CARL HAYDEN, Member of Congress:

Whereas a bridge across the Gila River near the Pima Indian Agency will be of great benefit and convenience to the Pima Indians in crossing the river in times of flood; and

Whereas a diversion dam is contemplated by the Federal Government at the intake of a large canal near the Pima Indian Agency: Now therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Second Legislature of the State of Arizona (the Senate concurring), That it is the desire of the legislature that the Arizona Representatives in the Federal Congress use their best efforts to procure by the Congress now in session an appropriation for the construction of a combined bridge and diversion dam to be located in the Gila River, Pinal County, Ariz., at a point about 2½ miles above the Pima Indian Agency and within the Gila River Indian Reservation.

Passed the senate January 26, 1915, by a vote of 19 ayes, no noes.

W. P. SIMS, President.
OSCAR UTE, Secretary.

Passed the house January 28, 1915, by a vote of 35 ayes, no noes.

WILLIAM E. BROOKS,
Speaker of the House.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Flagstaff, Ariz., remonstrating against the United States Government recognizing Mexico unless religious freedom is guaranteed in that Republic, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented petitions of sundry citizens of Michigan, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the exportation of ammunition, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Michigan, remonstrating against the exclusion of certain matter from the mail, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Plainwell, Mich., praying for a continuance of the free mail delivery in villages, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a memorial of the congregation of St. John's Church, of Ypsilanti, Mich., remonstrating against existing conditions in Mexico, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SWANSON, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 18172) to increase the limit of cost of the United States post-office building at Seymour, Ind., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 980) thereon.

Mr. OVERMAN. From the Committee on Rules, I report back adversely Senate resolution 538, submitted by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] on February 11, 1915, proposing to amend the rules of the Senate relating to debate, and I ask that the report may take its place on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. OVERMAN. By direction of the Committee on Rules, I report back adversely Senate resolution 113, submitted by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] on June 17, 1913, to amend Rule XIX of the Standing Rules of the Senate, and I ask that the report may take its place on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. GALLINGER. These resolutions are reported adversely?

Mr. OVERMAN. Yes. I thought the Secretary would state that they were reported adversely.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Secretary did not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolutions will be placed on the calendar.

COTTON WAREHOUSES.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to call attention to Senate bill 6266, which was passed, sent to the House, reported, and passed in the House by substitute. The Senate has taken no action upon the report from the House that the bill was passed by substitute there. We have asked for no conference and we have not referred the House substitute to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The bill has been left somewhat to my direction, as the original Senate bill was introduced by me. I desire to bring these facts to the attention of the Senate in order that the entire Senate may take the responsibility for whatever direction shall be given to the subject. Perhaps we ought to insist upon our bill and ask for a conference.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, will the Senator state what the bill is?

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to have the Senator tell us what the bill is.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is the bill creating warehouses under certain circumstances. The bill, as I originally introduced it, applied to cotton warehouses. The bill now, as passed by the House, applies to that and other agricultural products. My interest in the bill is not as great as it was when I first introduced it, because we have found a way to meet the emergency that was upon us as far as that matter was concerned.

Mr. SMOOT. May I ask the Senator if it is a House bill that has been handed down to the Senate?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. No; it is a House report presenting a substitute for the Senate bill, which lies on the table unacted upon, the Senate not having asked for a conference and not having referred it to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and not having called it up to take any action upon it. Of course, being reported by the House as a substitute for the Senate bill, it occupies a certain status of precedence; but I have not called it up, and I do not want to take the responsibility of nonaction upon myself alone.

Mr. SMOOT. Why does not the Senator, when the bill is laid before the Senate, disagree to the amendments of the House and ask a conference and have the Chair appoint the conferees?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I did not do so because I did not know the attitude of the grain Senators upon this subject. So far as those interested in the original measure are concerned, that dealing with cotton, the changes are not material; but it has been broadened so as to extend over other agricultural products, and I wanted them to take some responsibility in connection with the matter.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia yield for a question?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. I understand there are some slight amendments suggested on which there is general agreement, which would relieve certain dealers and producers from hardships created by this bill, as they think. If this matter were sent to conference, would it not preclude the insertion of those amendments?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think that is probably true. We might go to conference and agree to the House bill with certain amendments.

Mr. BURTON. For that reason I should like to have it go over for the present.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have not asked that it go to conference. I think, myself, that the bill as passed by the House ought to be amended. I find several provisions in it that I think certainly ought to be changed.

Mr. BURTON. I should prefer not to have the bill go to conference at the present time.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I wish to add that I have asked Senators who are interested in this bill to examine the House substitute and to prepare, if they would, such amendments as they thought ought to be made, believing that perhaps we could agree on those amendments and amend the House substitute, and that the House would then probably accede to the Senate amendments to the House substitute. I am not asking a conference, because I think there ought to be amendments made to the House substitute.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. I think that much the better course—to leave this open for amendment on the floor of the Senate rather than to send it to conference. Then we could make such amendments as may be required to perfect the bill.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. I feel like joining in the request just made by my colleague, for the reason that I have had a great many protests from Ohio from the grain dealers, and I have not had time to examine them fully enough to determine their merits. I should like the matter to be held in abeyance a few days until we can take up the matter.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, if the Senator from Georgia will allow me, if it is in order I would suggest that we ought to have the bill referred to the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to add that I had requested the Senators who objected to certain features of the House bill to prepare the amendments that they desired made to it; but I have received from no Senator a perfected amendment. I have received a number of criticisms, but no specific amendment, and I am not sure but that the suggestion of the Senator from South Carolina is the only way to bring the matter to a head, by referring the House substitute to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, as I understand the situation, the Senate passed a bill, S. 6266. It went to the House, and the House struck out all after the enacting clause and inserted new provisions. Then that has come back to the Senate as a House bill, and it has not been handed down to the Senate. The only proper way to do is for the Chair, when the time comes, to lay it before the Senate, and then the Senate can disagree to the amendments of the House and ask for a conference. This bill can not be returned to the committee. It can be handled in conference, and in conference only. Of course it could be amended here on the floor of the Senate, but not by a committee.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think there is any doubt——

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. ROOT. Surely the Senator from Utah does not mean that the Senate has not the power to send this bill to a committee?

Mr. SMOOT. I mean that the bill has been to a committee, was reported from a committee, passed the Senate, went to the House, passed the House, was returned to the Senate, and has not yet been laid before the Senate; but if the Chair hands down the bill the Senate can then amend the bill on the floor of the Senate, or it can disagree to the amendments of the House and ask for a conference.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Or it can recommit at any time.

Mr. ROOT. The Senate can send the bill to a committee. Whether that would be a wise thing or not, I do not know. I should like to see something done with this bill. I think there is useful legislation to be gotten out of it. Whether or not the details should be thus and so, I do not know, but surely we can send it to a committee.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, if the Senator from Georgia will allow me, this comes back to us in the form of a House bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Oh, no; the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do not mean under a new title, but it is really new matter, and it is of such importance that I do not think it could be properly attended to on the floor of the Senate. It is competent for us to send it back to the committee, and I hope the Senator from Georgia will make that motion.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say that if the Senate wants to send it to the committee I shall not object, but that is an unusual way of doing.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do.

Mr. NELSON. It seems to me that in view of the fact that the House, by its substitute, substantially changed the entire bill, it is almost like sending us a new bill, and that it ought to be referred to the committee for consideration.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. It is not in such condition that we can handle it on the floor of the Senate, and in its present condition it ought not to go to a conference committee. I have no particular interest in the bill, because, as I look at it, it does not particularly affect our people in the Northwest; but, after all,

I think the wisest course is to refer it to the committee and have it carefully considered.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, having waited several weeks in an effort to obtain amendments from the Senators who contemplated amendment, I think the suggestion is the only proper one. Undoubtedly we can recommit this bill. We voted only a few days ago that we could recommit a bill at any time before final passage; and I move that this measure, the original bill and the House substitute, be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 6266) to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to license cotton warehouses, and for other purposes, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That this act shall be known by the short title of 'United States warehouse act.'

"SEC. 2. That the term 'warehouse' as used in this act shall be deemed to mean every building, structure, or other protected inclosure in which any agricultural product is or may be stored or held. The term 'agricultural product' wherever used in this act shall be held to include cotton, grain, and other agricultural products designated by the Secretary of Agriculture to be staple and nonperishable.

"SEC. 3. That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to investigate the storage, warehousing, classifying, grading, weighing, and certification of agricultural products; upon application to him, to inspect warehouses or cause them to be inspected; at any time, with or without application to him, to inspect or cause to be inspected all warehouses licensed under this act; to determine whether warehouses for which licenses are applied for or have been issued under this act are suitable for the proper storage or holding of agricultural products; to classify warehouses in accordance with their location, surroundings, capacity, condition, and other qualities, and as to the kinds of licenses issued or that may be issued to them pursuant to this act; and to prescribe the duties of the owners and operators of warehouses licensed under this act with respect to the care of and responsibility for agricultural products stored or held therein.

"SEC. 4. That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized, upon application to him by the owner or operator of a warehouse, to issue a license for the conduct of the same, subject to this act and such rules and regulations as may be made hereunder. Each license shall specify the date upon which it is to terminate, and, upon showing satisfactory to the Secretary of Agriculture, may, from time to time, be renewed or extended by a written instrument, which shall specify the date of its termination: Provided, That the Secretary of Agriculture may, under such rules as he may prescribe, issue a license to any person not the owner or operator of a warehouse, to accept the custody of agricultural products and to store the same in any warehouse or warehouses owned and operated by any State. Each person so licensed shall issue receipts for the agricultural products placed in his custody and shall give bond in accordance with all the provisions of this act affecting the owners and operators of warehouses licensed hereunder, and such rules and regulations as may be prescribed hereunder by the Secretary of Agriculture, and shall otherwise be subject to this act and said regulations.

"The owner or operator of every warehouse licensed under this act shall execute and file with the Secretary of Agriculture a good and sufficient bond to the United States, and such warehouses shall be designated as bonded. Said bond shall be in such form and amount, shall have such surety or sureties, and shall contain such terms and conditions as the Secretary of Agriculture may require to carry out the purposes of this act. No warehouse shall be designated as bonded under this act, and no name or description conveying the impression that it is so bonded, shall be used until a bond such as provided for in this section has been filed with and approved by the Secretary of Agriculture.

"Any person injured by the misconduct or negligence of the principal named in the bond shall be entitled in an action upon the bond, brought in his own right and name in any court having jurisdiction of the same, to recover all losses he may have sustained.

"SEC. 5. That the Secretary of Agriculture shall charge, assess, and cause to be collected a reasonable fee for every examination or inspection of a warehouse under this act when such examination or inspection is made upon application of the owner or operator of such warehouse, and a fee not exceeding $2 per annum for each license or renewal thereof issued to the owner or operator of a warehouse under this act. All such fees shall be deposited and covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

"SEC. 6. That the Secretary of Agriculture may, upon presentation of satisfactory proof of competency, issue to any person a license to classify or grade agricultural products or specified kinds of agricultural products and to certificate the class or grade thereof, or to weigh said agricultural products and certificate the weight thereof; or to classify, grade, and weigh agricultural products or specified kinds of agricultural products and to certificate the class, grade, and weight thereof, under such rules and regulations as may be made pursuant to this act. Any such license issued under this act may be suspended or revoked whenever the Secretary of Agriculture is satisfied that the holder thereof has failed to classify, grade, or weigh agricultural products correctly or has violated any provision of this act or of the rules and regulations made thereunder, or that the license has been used for any improper purpose whatsoever: Provided, That no such licensed person shall inspect or grade grain or shall certify, or otherwise indicate in writing, the grade of any grain which has been inspected or graded by him unless and until he has been duly authorized or employed by State, county, city, town, board of trade, chamber of commerce, corporation, society, or association to inspect and grade grain: Provided further, That in States which have State grain inspection established by law the Secretary of Agriculture may, in his discretion, issue licenses to persons duly authorized and employed to inspect grain under the laws of such State at the time this act goes into effect.

"SEC. 7. That the owner or operator of every licensed warehouse shall receive for storage, without any discrimination between persons, any agricultural products tendered to him in a suitable condition for warehousing in the usual manner in the ordinary and usual course of business: Provided, That grain or flaxseed so received shall be graded and inspected by an inspector duly licensed under this act and shall be stored with grain or flaxseed of a similar grade; and in no case, in a warehouse licensed under this act, shall grain or flaxseed of different grades be mixed together while in store. No owner or operator of a warehouse duly licensed under this act shall sell or otherwise dispose of, or deliver out of store, any such agricultural product without the express authority of its owner and the return of the storage receipt. For all agricultural products stored or held by a warehouse licensed under this act original receipts, serially numbered, shall be issued by the owner or operator thereof, signed by himself or by his duly authorized agent. No such receipt shall be issued except for agricultural products actually stored or held in the warehouse at the time of the issuance thereof. No duplicate of an original receipt shall be issued unless the same be plainly and conspicuously marked "duplicate" upon the face thereof. While an original receipt or any duplicate thereof issued under this act is outstanding and uncanceled by the owner or operator of the warehouse issuing the same no other or further receipt shall be issued for the agricultural product, except that in the case of lost or destroyed receipts new receipts may be issued upon the giving of satisfactory security in compliance with the rules and regulations made pursuant to this act. Any receipt issued in lieu of an original shall be upon the same terms and subject to such conditions as are prescribed by this act for such original receipt. Each original receipt shall contain such terms and conditions, not inconsistent with the laws of the respective States in which issued, as the Secretary of Agriculture may require for carrying out the purposes of this act, including a true statement of the date and place of its issuance, its serial number, and the location of the warehouse in which the agricultural product is stored or held, and shall state that the agricultural product is deliverable upon the return of the receipt properly indorsed and upon payment of proper legal charges, if any be due to the owner or operator of the warehouse. Upon return of the receipt to the owner or operator of the warehouse issuing the same and upon the payment or tender of all advances and legal charges agricultural products of the same class or grade and quantity named therein shall be delivered to the holder of such receipt within 24 hours after facilities for receiving the same have been provided: Provided, That in the case of cotton or other agricultural products customarily put up in bales or packages each original receipt shall include a description of such bales or packages by marks, numbers, or other means of identification, and the weight thereof; the owner of such original receipt shall be entitled upon presentation thereof and the payment of accrued charges to receive the identical bale or package described therein within 24 hours after facilities for receiving the same have been provided.

"SEC. 8. That the owner or operator of any warehouse licensed under this act shall keep complete and correct records of all agricultural products stored or held therein and withdrawn therefrom, of all original warehouse receipts, and duplicates of the same, issued by the owner or operator of the warehouse, and of the receipts returned to and canceled by the owner or operator thereof, shall make reports to the Secretary of Agriculture, in such form and at such times as he may require, and shall be conducted and operated in all other respects in compliance with this act and the rules and regulations made hereunder.

"SEC. 9. That any warehouse receipt or certificate of the class or grade of any agricultural product issued under this act shall specify the class or grade of the agricultural product covered thereby in accordance with the official standard of the United States applicable thereto, as the same may be fixed and promulgated hereunder under authority of law: Provided, That until such official standards for any agricultural product shall have been fixed and promulgated under authority of law, such warehouse receipts or certificates of the class or grade of agricultural products may be issued in accordance with any other recognized standard, or in accordance with such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture. Such receipts or certificates shall show the description or the standard in accordance with which the agricultural product has been classified or graded.

"SEC. 10. That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to cause examinations to be made of any agricultural product stored or held in any warehouse licensed under this act. Whenever, after opportunity for hearing is given to the owner or operator of such warehouse, it is determined that such owner or operator of such warehouse is not performing fully the duties imposed on him by this act and the rules and regulations made hereunder, the Secretary may publish his findings.

"SEC. 11. That the Secretary of Agriculture may suspend or revoke any license issued to any owner or operator of such warehouse under this act for any violation of or failure to comply with any provision of this act or of the rules and regulations made hereunder, and any such license may be suspended or revoked, after opportunity for hearing has been afforded to the licensee concerned, upon the ground that unreasonable or exorbitant charges have been made for services rendered.

"SEC. 12. That all the provisions of this act are hereby extended to include warehouses for the storage of tobacco.

"SEC. 13. That the Secretary of Agriculture from time to time may publish the results of any investigations made under section 3 of this act; and he shall publish the names and locations of warehouses licensed and bonded and the names and addresses of persons licensed under this act and lists of all licenses terminated under this act and the causes therefor.

"SEC. 14. That the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized, through officials, employees, or agents of the Department of Agriculture designated by him, to examine all books, records, papers, and accounts of warehouses licensed under this act and of the owners or operators of such warehouses relating thereto.

"SEC. 15. That the Secretary of Agriculture shall from time to time make such rules and regulations as he may deem necessary for the efficient execution of the provisions of this act.

"SEC. 16. That every person who shall forge, alter, counterfeit, simulate, or falsely represent, or shall without proper authority use, any license issued by the Secretary of Agriculture to any owner or operator of a warehouse, or to any grader, classer, or weigher, under this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall be fined not more than $500 or imprisoned not more than six months, or both, in the discretion of the court.

"SEC. 17. That the words 'owner' or 'operator' wherever used in this act shall be construed to import the plural or singular, as the case demands, and shall include individuals, associations, partnerships, and corporations.

"SEC. 18. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100,000, available until expended, for the expenses of carrying into effect the provisions of this act, including the payment of such rent and the employment of such persons and means as the Secretary of Agriculture may deem necessary in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and he is authorized, in his discretion, to call upon qualified persons not regularly in the service of the United States for temporary assistance in carrying out the purposes of this act, and, out of the moneys appropriated by this act, to pay the salaries and expenses thereof."

Amend the title so as to read: "An act to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to license warehouses, and for other purposes."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The bill was handed down three weeks ago and laid before the Senate then, when it came from the House. It was formally laid before the Senate, and the request was then made that it might go over without action. I would not have brought this matter to the attention of the Senate had not the President of the Senate handed the measure down as it came from the House and placed it before the Senate.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. What is the present status of this bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has no means of obtaining such information except as the Chair gets it from the desk.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I renew the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed that the bill was not laid down until this time; that it was requested that it be held by the Journal clerk, and he has held it from the time it came from the House until the present moment.

Mr. REED. Now, what is the motion?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is to refer it to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. If there is no objection——

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill go to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, I should like to be heard on that question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maryland.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, for several weeks past this measure has been lying on the desk of the Presiding Officer of the Senate. It is a proposition of vital importance to all the agricultural interests of this country. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] and I have been in conference about the matter. We traced the matter to the House and back and followed the proceedings there. The bill as sent back from the House to the Senate can be handled on the floor without the slightest difficulty if there is a willingness on the part of this body to actually stand behind the interests of the farmers and producers of this country. There is no reason, Mr. President, for smothering this bill in committee. There is no reason for creating a conference committee to handle the matter. The bill is a perfectly simple, clear, and straightforward measure.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I want to assure the Senator there is no purpose of smothering it on my part. It seemed to be smothering where it was, and I hoped by this reference the amendment of the House could be perfected and we could get it in a state where we could vote on it.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. When this matter was first discussed between the Senator from Georgia and myself after it came back from the House he was in doubt whether we could amend it on the floor, but after considering the parliamentary situation he agreed that the bill could be amended by the Senate on the floor in certain minor particulars in respect to which amendments were needed and conceded as necessary by the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture of the House. There are some small amendments that ought to go in to protect the State warehouse system, so that the State warehouse system can operate as well as the privately or corporately owned warehouses, which are provided for under the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to ask the Senator what, in his judgment, is the reason why this bill can not take the ordinary course that bills usually do? Why should it not go to conference now and the amendments the Senator speaks of be agreed to in conference and then reported back to the Senate and the House?

Mr. LEE of Maryland. The reason is this. It depends on how much you are interested, how much the Senator from Nebraska is interested, in acting immediately and affording prompt recognition and relief to the producing agricultural interests of the country. If you do not think it is worth while to handle this propostion that concerns the farmers and producers of this country with any degree of promptness or consideration, very well, refer it back to the committee.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the very reason why I have suggested it ought to go now to conference.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. It is inexplicable that a bill which has been lying here for three weeks, a bill that so vitally concerns the agricultural interests of this country, a bill that can be amended in the Senate in five minutes if the Senate will act and sent back to the House, the House, as I am advised, being ready to concur at once in such amendments as the Senate may suggest, a bill of so much importance to the agricultural interests of the country, should be dealt with in this dilatory fashion.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, is not the Senator rather rash in saying we can dispose of the bill in five minutes in the Senate?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Under what order are we now proceeding?

The VICE PRESIDENT. None that the Chair knows of, except that a motion to refer a bill to a committee is debatable. The whole procedure was out of order under the call of reports of committees. We have not yet finished the morning business.

Mr. REED. I call for the regular order, Mr. President.

Mr. LEE of Maryland. Mr. President, am I in order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that upon an objection being made during the regular morning procedure until it is concluded these motions are not in order.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. If I may be permitted a word, this bill has no privilege. Its privilege is exhausted when the message is laid before the Senate, and it is for the Senate to say whether it will consider it or whether it will not. Of course, it is out of order now, if the Senator from Missouri objects, because we are on morning business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was letting it proceed——

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; I understand that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. As nine-tenths of what is done in the morning hour proceeds.

Mr. LODGE. I wish to say a single word. The Senate, of course, has a right to amend an amendment to a Senate bill returned from the House, and the House has the same power in making such amendments. It can adopt any procedure it chooses. It can send it to the committee first, if it likes, and under the House rules that is provided for. But here we have no special rule. However, of course, it is open to send it to a committee, or to amend it on the floor, but at this moment if a point of order is made, as the Senator from Missouri has made it, it is clearly out of order.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. When a bill has been laid down from the House that had been sent to the House by the Senate, whether in the morning hour or at any other time, it has always been treated as in order to move to refer or to disagree and appoint conferees. That has been the uniform practice here at whatever hour. It does not go to the calendar; it is the present matter before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is not any doubt that that has been done. There is not any doubt but that we have been proceeding in that way; but the Chair believes that there is a certain order of procedure and that, if there be an objection made, that order must be followed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then will the Chair indicate at what time he considers the matter can be brought before the Senate for the Senate to give direction to it? It seemed to me that the proper time to call it up was in connection with reports of committees in the morning hour; that then we were sending matters to committees and we could handle a matter that was upon the desk not for final action but for temporary action. I do not know any rule specifically setting apart a time to handle such questions; but it is on the table, just like a resolution coming over; it occupies very much the status of a bill reported from a committee or a bill presented, and the Senate assigns it its place, as it has no place now.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator from Georgia will allow me, a bill returned from the House, a message from the House in any form, or from the President, is privileged to the extent of its being in order to lay it before the Senate at any time; but when that is once done the privilege is exhausted, and the Senate can then deal with it as it pleases. It can consider it at the moment when laid before it. In this case it was laid before us, I understand, three weeks ago, but a request was made that it should go over. The Senate can deal with it at any time. It can consider it; it can refer it; it can amend it; it can do anything it pleases. It can refuse consideration, if it chooses, and let it remain on the table. At this moment, as the Chair has already pointed out, we are still in the morning business, and I think the regular order, of course, can not be interfered with by anything.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. We are at the close of the morning business, when resolutions and motions that have come over are in order.

Mr. LODGE. The morning business has not closed.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I would have had no objection at all to the matter being disposed of if it could have been disposed of without debate; but long arguments and speeches at this time imply a reply, and that implies using up the morning hour. That is the reason why I made the objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was in doubt about the matter and permitted the Senator from Maryland to proceed, there being no objection, but clause 6 of Rule VII provides that:

> The Presiding Officer may at any time lay, and it shall be in order at any time for a Senator to move to lay, before the Senate any bill or other matter sent to the Senate by the President or the House of Representatives, and any question pending at that time shall be suspended for this purpose. Any motion so made shall be determined without debate.

Manifestly the purpose of that rule was not to permit debate on these questions.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. With the consent of the Senate, I will withdraw the motion to refer to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. I move that the Senate disagree to the House amendment and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I hope that course will not be pursued. I think there are slight modifications which can be made in the bill, and I feel compelled to object to that course.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Georgia moves that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Mr. REED. I make the point of order that that motion is out of order.

Mr. BURTON. I should like to ask if that can be done in the face of an objection?

The VICE PRESIDENT. If we can do anything about this matter at all just now, it can be done. The Chair has felt that until the conclusion of the regular routine morning business, upon objection, none of these motions are in order. In order to cut the Gordian knot the Chair will rule upon the objection that until the completion of the routine morning business they are not in order. An appeal can be taken from that, if anyone desires to appeal.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, we are now under reports of committees.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair holds that the whole matter until the conclusion of the morning business is not in order.

THE PARCEL POST (S. DOC. NO. 944).

Mr. BRISTOW. I submit the report of the Joint Committee to Investigate the General Parcel Post, which I ask may be printed and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE.

Mr. WILLIAMS. From the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expense of the Senate I report back favorably without amendment Senate resolution 539, authorizing the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry to hold hearings, and so forth, for which I ask immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 539), introduced by Mr. GORE on the 11th instant, as follows:

> Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized, during the Sixty-third Congress, to employ a stenographer, at a price not to exceed $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had or may have been had in connection with any subject which may be pending before the said committee; and the expense thereof shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator from Mississippi if this resolution proposes to cover the investigation by the subcommittee to investigate the foot-and-mouth disease?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; that has been already covered by another resolution. This is chiefly in connection with some investigations about grain.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was agreed to.

SCHOOL BUILDINGS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HOLLIS. From the Committee on the District of Columbia I report back favorably House bill 13222, to regulate the use of public-school buildings and grounds in the District of Columbia. This bill was introduced simultaneously in the House and in the Senate a year ago. It was reported unanimously by the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia, and passed the Senate without objection. It went to the House, and instead of being acted upon there the House took up a bill of the same tenor that was introduced by Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky, and passed it and sent it here. In order that the matter may be finally disposed of I ask that the House bill may be put upon its passage at this time.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I ask that the bill may go over until to-morrow in order that I may examine it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the bill will be placed on the calendar.

Mr. HOLLIS. Mr. President, I think the request of the Senator from Missouri was not that the bill should go to the calendar. I understand that he asked to have it go over until to-morrow. I think that request would hardly displace the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Where is the rule that permits a bill to go over for a day? There is objection to its present consideration.

Mr. REED. I meant my statement to be in the form of a polite objection to the consideration of the bill at this time. I meant to imply that I would not object to its consideration to-morrow morning.

Mr. HOLLIS. Then I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the report.

Mr. SMOOT. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire withdraws the report.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS INTRODUCED.

Bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. BRADY:

A bill (S. 7636) granting an increase of pension to Frank L. Simpson (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 7637) granting an increase of pension to James A. Saurbaugh (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (S. 7646) to authorize Parkersburg-Ohio Bridge Company, a corporation created and existing under the laws of the State of West Virginia, its successors and assigns, to construct a bridge across the Ohio River from the city of Parkersburg, State of West Virginia, to the town of Belpre, State of Ohio; to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. BRADY:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 235) for the relief of N. B. Pettibone (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 236) for the relief of James L. Cardwell (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Public Lands.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. GRONNA submitted an amendment providing that it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to send through the mails any newspapers, magazines, circular letters, or other matter advertising the sale or gift of any commodity or article, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Post Office appropriation bill (H. R. 19906), which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed.

Mr. POINDEXTER submitted an amendment proposing to provide the Federal aid necessary to demonstrate the practical value of the amendments to the denatured alcohol law of the act of October 3, 1913, intended to be proposed by him to the Agricultural appropriation bill (H. R. 20415), which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SAULSBURY submitted an amendment providing for the connecting of the parkway between Rock Creek and Potomac Parks in the District of Columbia, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill (H. R. 21318), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for a domestic potato investigation from $50,000 to $125,000, intended to be proposed by him to the Agricultural appropriation bill (H. R. 20415), which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HUGHES submitted an amendment providing that any employee in the classified civil service in post offices of the first and second class or in the Railway Mail Service or Rural Delivery Service, who has served the United States for 30 years or more and who shall have attained the age of 60 years or over, may retire and shall receive 50 per cent of the average annual salary pay or compensation he may have received for the five years next preceding his retirement, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Post Office appropriation bill (H. R. 19906), which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads and ordered to be printed.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. O'GORMAN submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill (H. R. 20189), which was ordered to be printed, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Commerce.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Latta, Executive Clerk, announced that the President had approved and signed the following act on February 11, 1915:

S. 655. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to survey the lands of the abandoned Fort Assinniboine Military Reservation and open the same to settlement.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I gave notice on yesterday that I would introduce an amendment to Rule XL. I desire to inquire from the Chair whether that amendment can be introduced during the morning hour under the head of "Concurrent or other resolutions"?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair was proposing to hand them down in regular order.

Mr. REED. Mine was merely a notice yesterday. I now desire to present a formal resolution. Is it in order at this time to present it? That is the inquiry. The question was raised yesterday whether this could be done in the morning hour, and I desire a ruling of the Chair as to whether it can be done in the morning hour.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The thing that has heretofore been done, since the present occupant of the chair has been here, has been this: That the notice has been given, it being a notice in writing, and it has been handed down as the last thing in the regular routine morning business as resolutions coming over from a preceding day. That is the way it always has been done.

Mr. REED. I did not regard the notice as a resolution, but a notice that a resolution would be introduced.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri can introduce it now.

Mr. REED. I now desire to introduce the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the United States Senate:

Pursuant to the provisions of Rule XI of the standing rules of the Senate, I propose the following amendment to the rules:

Add, at the end of Rule XXII of the standing rules of the Senate, the following:

"Not later than the hour of 2 o'clock p. m. of the calendar day, February 19, 1915, all debate upon Senate bill 6856 shall cease, and at the time aforesaid the Senate shall proceed to vote upon said bill and all amendments thereto without further debate. The final vote upon said bill shall be taken not later than 5 o'clock p. m. of said date.

"The foregoing proceedings shall have precedence over all other motions whatsoever."

Mr. REED. Mr. President, upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the resolution proposes to fix a time for a final vote, which is a matter that heretofore it has been considered necessary to obtain unanimous consent to do. I think it should go over anyway one day.

Mr. REED. I could not hear the statement of the Senator.

Mr. GALLINGER. My observation was that the resolution changes the rules of the body, and ought to go over at least one day; and I added, furthermore, that it proposes to secure a final vote on a bill by a majority of this body without commitment to a committee. Heretofore it has required unanimous consent to secure a vote of that kind. Now, does the Senator propose to change our procedure in that regard by this resolution?

Mr. REED. I propose, if this resolution is in order, to now ask a vote.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to refer the resolution to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. REED. I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion to lay on the table is not debatable.

Mr. REED. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is the request for the yeas and nays seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah will state his point of order.

Mr. SMOOT. Is this the notice that was given by the Senator from Missouri yesterday to change the rules?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. SMOOT. Well, the point of order is, Mr. President, that under the rules such a notice must lie over for a day and that it must be referred to the Committee on Rules under the rules. That is the only way to proceed.

Mr. REED. The pending question is a motion to table, and the point of order does not go to that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No.

Mr. SMOOT. The point of order——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I think many of us were not listening when the resolution was read, and I will ask to have the subject matter read again from the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary again read the notice submitted by Mr. REED.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Chair state, so that it may be understood, what we are voting on?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senate is not voting; the roll is about to be called in response to the suggestion of the absence of a quorum.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Goff	Newlands	Smith, Ariz.
Borah	Gore	Norris	Smith, Ga.
Brady	Gronna	O'Gorman	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	Hollis	Overman	Smith, Mich.
Bryan	Hughes	Owen	Smith, S. C.
Burleigh	James	Page	Smoot
Burton	Johnson	Penrose	Stephenson
Catron	Jones	Perkins	Sterling
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Pittman	Stone
Chilton	Kern	Poindexter	Sutherland
Clapp	La Follette	Pomerene	Thomas
Clark, Wyo.	Lane	Reed	Thompson
Colt	Lea, Tenn.	Robinson	Thornton

Culberson	Lewis	Saulsbury	Townsend
Cummins	Lippitt	Shafroth	Walsh
Dillingham	Lodge	Sheppard	Warren
du Pont	Martin, Va.	Sherman	Weeks
Fall	Martine, N. J.	Shields	White
Fletcher	Myers	Shively	Williams
Gallinger	Nelson	Simmons

Mr. THORNTON. I desire to announce the necessary absence of the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and to state that he is paired with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS]. I ask that this announcement stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

On yesterday the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] gave notice of an amendment to the rules. He gave it in writing. It went over until to-day. He supplements it now with what is termed a resolution, which is in substance the same as the notice given on yesterday. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has moved to refer it to the Committee on Rules. The Senator from Missouri has moved to lay the motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Rules on the table. On this question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). I have a temporary pair with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], and in his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], and I therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call have been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 45, nays 46, as follows:

YEAS—45.

Ashurst	Lane	Pomerene	Stone
Bryan	Lea, Tenn.	Reed	Swanson
Chamberlain	Lee, Md.	Robinson	Thomas
Chilton	Lewis	Saulsbury	Thompson
Fletcher	Martin, Va.	Shafroth	Thornton
Gore	Martine, N. J.	Sheppard	Tillman
Hollis	Myers	Shields	Walsh
Hughes	Newlands	Shively	White
James	Norris	Simmons	Williams
Johnson	Overman	Smith, Ariz.
Kern	Owen	Smith, Md.
La Follette	Pittman	Smith, S. C.

NAYS—46.

Bankhead	Colt	Kenyon	Sherman
Borah	Crawford	Lippitt	Smith, Mich.
Brady	Cummins	Lodge	Smoot
Brandegee	Dillingham	McLean	Stephenson
Bristow	du Pont	Nelson	Sterling
Burleigh	Fall	O'Gorman	Sutherland
Burton	Gallinger	Oliver	Townsend
Camden	Goff	Page	Vardaman
Catron	Gronna	Penrose	Warren
Clapp	Hardwick	Perkins	Works
Clark, Wyo.	Hitchcock	Poindexter
Clarke, Ark.	Jones	Root

NOT VOTING—5.

Culberson	Ransdell	Smith, Ga.	Weeks
McCumber

So the Senate refused to lay the motion to refer on the table.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to refer to the committee.

Mr. REED. I move to amend the motion to refer to the Committee on Rules so as to refer to the Committee on Finance. I make that motion for the reason that it is well known that the majority of the Committee on Rules are opposed to any amendment to the rule that will cut off debate or that will give us an opportunity to dispose of this business. That fact is shown by the action of the committee in reporting adversely the Williams resolution, and upon my motion I now demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. REED. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I should like to know what the motion is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is to lay on the table the motion of the Senator from Missouri to refer the resolution to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, is a motion to refer to a committee amendable by substituting another committee?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The rules expressly say that it is not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question was not raised.

Mr. BRYAN. I raise it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the roll call has been started.

Mr. GALLINGER. There has been no response to the roll call, I understand.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There has been no response to the roll call. The Senator from Florida raises the point of order that the motion to refer to the Committee on Rules is not amendable. The Chair will be compelled to sustain the point of order, under section 1 of Rule XXVI:

> When motions are made for reference of a subject to a select committee, or to a standing committee, the question of reference to a standing committee shall be put first; and a motion simply to refer shall not be open to amendment, except to add instructions.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I move to amend the motion to refer to the Committee on Rules by adding the instruction that the Committee on Rules shall report the resolution forthwith, and favorably, and without further amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move to lay that on the table.

Mr. REED. The Senator from New Hampshire will kindly wait until I get off the floor.

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I want to state that there is no rule of the Senate to which my attention has been called requiring any motion of this kind to go to a committee. That rule ordinarily applies, but it does not apply here, because the notice takes its place. The rule is:

> No motion to suspend, modify, or amend any rule, or any part thereof, shall be in order, except on one day's notice in writing, specifying precisely the rule or part proposed to be suspended, modified, or amended, and the purpose thereof. Any rule may be suspended without notice by the unanimous consent of the Senate.

Upon my motion, Mr. President, I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have the floor, and am demanding the yeas and nays, and my demand has not been disposed of.

Mr. GALLINGER. That does not make any difference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A motion to lay on the table can not be cut off.

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course not.

Mr. REED. Upon that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). Again announcing my temporary pair with the senior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], I withhold my vote.

Mr. WEEKS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the junior Senator from Louisanna [Mr. RANSDELL] and withhold my vote.

The roll call having been concluded, it resulted as follows:

YEAS—46.

Bankhead	Colt	Kenyon	Sherman
Borah	Crawford	Lippitt	Smith, Mich.
Brady	Cummins	Lodge	Smoot
Brandegee	Dillingham	McLean	Stephenson
Bristow	du Pont	Nelson	Sterling
Burleigh	Fall	O'Gorman	Sutherland
Burton	Gallinger	Oliver	Townsend
Camden	Goff	Page	Vardaman
Catron	Gronna	Penrose	Warren
Clapp	Hardwick	Perkins	Works
Clark, Wyo.	Hitchcock	Poindexter
Clarke, Ark.	Jones	Root

NAYS—46.

Ashurst	Lane	Pomerene	Smith, S. C.
Bryan	Lea, Tenn.	Reed	Stone
Chamberlain	Lee, Md.	Robinson	Swanson
Chilton	Lewis	Saulsbury	Thomas
Fletcher	Martin, Va.	Shafroth	Thompson
Gore	Martine, N. J.	Sheppard	Thornton
Hollis	Myers	Shields	Tillman
Hughes	Newlands	Shively	Walsh
James	Norris	Simmons	White
Johnson	Overman	Smith, Ariz.	Williams
Kern	Owen	Smith, Ga.
La Follette	Pittman	Smith, Md.

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the motion to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Missouri, the yeas are 46 and the nays are 46; so the amendment is laid on the table. The question now recurs on the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. JAMES and Mr. REED called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

During the roll call,

Mr. REED. Mr. President, before the result of this vote is announced I desire to challenge the announcement of the vote last taken, which was on the motion to table my motion to instruct the committee.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, that is not in order.

Mr. PENROSE and others. Regular order!

Mr. REED. I insist that I have the right, before any other business is transacted, to have that vote verified. I challenge that vote, and I state to the Senate now that the record shows that a mistake was made in the announcement.

Mr. GALLINGER. Pending this roll call, nothing is in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Just a moment. The Senate of the United States can not afford, even if it does have a rule that a roll call can not be interrupted, to say that if there has been an incorrect announcement from the desk with reference to a preceding vote the matter shall not be determined. We can not afford to do that. The Chair will instruct the Secretaries to verify the preceding vote, and to state whether or not there was a correct announcement.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I ask for a recapitulation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, why not read the yea-and-nay vote?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes; the yeas and nays will be read, and we will see whether or not they are correct.

Mr. PENROSE. That should be done at the proper time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not think anyone will appeal from the Chair on a matter of that kind.

The Secretary recapitulated the vote on Mr. GALLINGER's motion to lay on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary announces now that on the motion to lay on the table the vote is yeas 46, nays 46. The motion is lost.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Regular order!

Mr. REED. I am rising to a question of high privilege.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Just one moment. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is Senate bill 6856. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. In view of the fact that there was a mistake made in the announcement of the vote on the question of laying my motion on the table, my motion being to instruct the committee to report forthwith and favorably and without amendment, I think the RECORD now ought to show that the subsequent proceedings are void, so that the question will now stand before the Senate as it would have stood if this error had not been made. I ask unanimous consent, in order that the RECORD may be correct, that the subsequent proceedings shall be held to be null and void.

Mr. OVERMAN. And expunged.

Mr. REED. And expunged.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I do not object to that. The announcement was not made, as I remember.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was not made.

Mr. GALLINGER. And the hour of 2 o'clock has arrived. I quite agree that that may be done as far as I am concerned.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The subsequent proceedings will be stricken out.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

Mr. REED. I make the point now, because I am appealing to the sense of fairness of the Senate. An error having occurred in the count, there being no fault on the part of anyone cencerned in making the motion, and I think without any intentional fault by anyone, the time lost ought to be counted as though it had not been lost, and we should proceed now to vote upon the main question, the reference to the committee with instructions.

Mr. JAMES. It would not have occurred but for the error.

Mr. REED. This situation would not have occurred except for the error. The Senate can not afford to take any advantage of an error of that sort.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair can not turn the clock back.

Mr. GALLINGER. No; if we are going to take care of the lost time in the Senate, we will be in more trouble than we have been in the last month. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is objection.

Mr. GALLINGER. Regular order!

Mr. FLETCHER. In view of the situation I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside until this matter is disposed of.

Mr. GALLINGER. I object.

Mr. REED. I move that the Senate proceed——

Mr. GALLINGER. Regular order!

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin. The Chair understands that the Senator from Missouri has yielded the floor.

Mr. REED. I have yielded the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire, however, before yielding the floor——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I desire, before formally yielding the floor, to say that I reserve the right now, and I give notice now, that to-morrow morning during the morning hour I shall bring forward this question, and shall insist at that time that this proposal before the Senate, as it is privileged, shall have precedence over any other business in the morning hour.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator can move to take it up. It is on the calendar.

Mr. GALLINGER. It will be resisted as a privileged motion. The Senator can move to take it up.

Mr. REED. I have not yielded the floor. Mr. President, I move that we proceed to the consideration of the rule which I have just offered, as that rule is now amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania will state it.

Mr. OLIVER. My point of order is that the Senator from Missouri had, in distinct terms, yielded the floor and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] had been recognized, and that consequently the Senator from Missouri did not have the floor when he made that motion.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The last inquiry the Chair made was whether the Senator from Missouri had yielded the floor, and the Senator from Missouri moved to take up this motion to amend the rules. The question is on the motion.

Mr. REED. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Senators, we must have some order. The roll call can not proceed. The clerks are unable to hear. We have had one mistake made this morning, and we do not want any more. Could the Senate of the United States just be kind enough to be in order?

Mr. GALLINGER. For a minute or two.

The VICE PRESIDENT. For a minute or two.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, has the roll call been begun?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has, and it will proceed.

The Secretary resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. CULBERSON (when his name was called). Again announcing my pair, I withhold my vote.

The roll call having been concluded, it resulted—yeas 47, nays 47, as follows:

YEAS—47.

Ashurst	Lane	Pomerene	Smith, Md.
Bryan	Lea, Tenn.	Ransdell	Smith, S. C.
Chamberlain	Lee, Md.	Reed	Stone
Chilton	Lewis	Robinson	Swanson

NOT VOTING—2.

Culberson	McCumber

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas are 47 and the nays are 47. The Vice President votes "yea," and lays the motion before the Senate.

Mr. REED. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. LODGE. What is the question now?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is to refer the proposed amendment to the rules to the Committee on Rules with instructions.

Mr. REED. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is not the question on the motion of the Senator from Missouri, to amend the motion to refer by adding instructions?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is right.

Mr. LODGE. By adding instructions. Mr. President, I take it that the question is debatable.

Mr. REED. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LODGE. I can not be taken from the floor or be cut off with a demand——

Mr. REED. The Senator can not get the floor while I have it.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator did not have it. I made the point of order and was recognized.

Mr. REED. I have demanded the yeas and nays, and the Chair started to put it. I should like to have that part completed.

Mr. LODGE. I asked a parliamentary question, whether this is not debatable?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Undoubtedly it is a debatable motion.

Mr. REED. I demand the yeas and nays on the question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the decision of the Senate the question is debatable.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I move to amend the motion to instruct the Committee on Rules by striking out the instructions given and adding that they be instructed to report as a substitute for the proposed amendment to the rules a new rule to be known as Rule XLI.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Nebraska moves as an amendment to strike out the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri and in lieu to insert:

That the committee be instructed to report:

"Rule XLI. It shall be in order during the morning hour to make a motion that any bill or resolution then on the calendar shall be considered under the terms of this rule. Such motion, when made, shall lie over one day and shall then be decided without debate. When it has been decided to consider a bill or resolution under this rule the same shall first be considered in general debate, during which time no Senator, except by unanimous consent, shall be allowed to speak more than three hours. At the close of general debate the bill or resolution shall be read for amendments and on any amendment that may be offered no Senator, except by unanimous consent, shall speak for more than 15 minutes: Provided, That any Senator who has not spoken for three hours in general debate shall in addition to said 15 minutes be allowed additional time, but in no case shall such additional time or times, including the time used by such Senator in general debate, exceed in the aggregate three hours. When the bill is being read for amendment all debate shall be confined to the amendment which is then pending."

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I was interrupted and I did not hear the Secretary when he first began to read. I only desire this as an amendment to the instructions. I do not want to strike out the word "forthwith." I am informed that the Secretary did not read that word. I desire the resolution to read, if this were amended, that the Committee on Rules are instructed to forthwith report the rule back amended by inserting what I have offered as a substitute for the rule itself.

Mr. STONE. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. STONE. I understood he had yielded the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not know whether he had yielded or not.

Mr. STONE. Has the Senator from Nebraska yielded the floor?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I am perfectly willing to yield.

Mr. STONE. The Chair asked the question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair did not know.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. STONE. I wish to ask the Chair at this point a question which, I think, has been decided in different ways, whether, after the yeas and nays have been ordered, an amendment to the pending question upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered is in order. I wish to say to the Senator from Nebraska that personally I will vote for his proposition if it can be brought before the Senate, but I wish to say that I would regard it as unfortunate at this time to complicate the pending question in the way proposed. Of course, these latter observations are addressed particularly to the Senator from Nebraska and can have no influence on the mind of the Chair and should not in answering the parliamentary question.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I was unable to hear what the Senator said owing to the confusion in this part of the Chamber. If he has addressed any remarks to me, I have not heard them.

Mr. STONE. I had addressed a parliamentary question to the Chair, and pending that I made an observation intended particularly for the consideration of the Senator from Nebraska, which I will repeat. I said that if the rule proposed by the Senator from Nebraska, which is a general proposition, were adopted, it would become a part of the standing rules of the Senate. I am not objecting to it. I am not putting myself in opposition to it, except to say to the Senator and to the Senate that if it is the desire of a majority of the Senate that a vote should be had on the bill we have been discussing here for many days, the shipping bill, so called, some rule must be adopted.

Now, we have a proposition before the Senate in form, and any addition to it or material change in it, it seems to me, will result in confusing the consideration of it and tend to defeat anything. I was very greatly in hopes that the Senator from Nebraska would permit the Senate to come to a vote upon the question as presented by my colleague [Mr. REED]. If afterwards the Senate desires in due course to establish a more permanent rule, I will join the Senator from Nebraska, as far as I am concerned, in taking it up and aiding as far as I can to that end.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will yield further, I should like to say to the Senator that I am perfectly willing to vote either on the proposition I have submitted or the proposition the Senator's colleague has submitted; but the Senator knows that they are both debatable and we will not reach a vote. If anyone wants to debate it, we can not help that.

Now, I prefer to adopt a rule which is permanent when we adopt one—that will apply to every bill and any bill that may be considered under its terms, although I am not saying I would not under conditions that might be exasperating vote for a special rule.

But there are serious objections to that, in my judgment. There are many Senators here who will vote for a general rule somewhat on the line I have offered, involving no principle, who will not vote for a special rule. I have not by my offering this amendment delayed consideration. Both are debatable. I was going to debate them, but I understood the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], who had given us notice to make a speech on the joint resolution that he offered, wanted to be heard, and I did not care to take him off the floor by talking now.

Mr. STONE. Nor do I. Mr. President, there is this thought that I wish to impress upon the Senator from Nebraska. His proposition is an offer to amend the pending proposition. That takes another vote. Every time you add a vote you put an obstacle in the way of reaching anything.

Mr. NORRIS. That is true; but any Senator can offer a dozen substitutes, even if they were voted down or defeated. There is not any limit to the number which may be offered.

Mr. STONE. I am aware that if the Senator from Nebraska can offer an amendment, some other Senator can; but, Mr. President, we are now at a pivotal and critical point, where I feel that if we stick to this proposition we will put it through the Senate and establish a rule by which the Senate will be brought to a vote on the main question, if the friends of the measure, among whom I count the Senator from Nebraska, judging by his votes, though I have never conferred a moment with him about it, are in favor of the measure with one or two amendments to it. Here is what can be done if we get the rule.

Mr. President, here is what can be done if we get a ruling: The amendment would be offered, and under the rule we would have to vote at a certain time on the bill and all pending amendments, thus bringing it directly to a test of strength in the Senate; but we must first have the rule, and I hope the Senators who wish to bring the matter to a test will not themselves interpose anything that tends to embarrass the progress of the movement here to establish even a special rule.

Mr. President, I wish to ask a parliamentary question. I ask whether an amendment, in the present parliamentary status, such as has been proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], or any other form of amendment to the pending question, is in order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. There was an appeal in the Senate from a decision of the Chair the other day, and the Senate decided that the Chair was in error, and that amendments may be offered and this question debated.

Mr. STONE. Well, I withdraw the question.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LANE. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. LANE. It will take but a moment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield merely for a question.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska a question. I understood him in his remarks the other day to say that he was in a general way in favor of the passage of this bill or a similar measure. I ask him if he has analyzed his motion? If his motion were to prevail, and the Senate began its work upon the schedule therein provided, it would take 13 days of 24 hours each in order to reach a conclusion, and if we only worked 12 hours a day we would consume 26 days. His motion, if it prevails, practically kills the bill at this session, if every Senator takes advantage of the opportunity offered.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator from Wisconsin will yield to me to answer the question of the Senator from Oregon, I should like to answer it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield further?

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Oregon obtained the permission of the Senator from Wisconsin to ask me a question.

He has not yet asked me a question, but he has made a statement.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield for a brief statement.

Mr. NORRIS. I will only reply briefly now to the Senator from Oregon [Mr. LANE], but when the Senator from Wisconsin shall have concluded, or at another time, I shall reply at length.

I wish to say that the Senator from Oregon is entirely wrong. He assumes that every Senator in the Senate is going to take the maximum time allowed by the proposed rule. If the friends of the bill want to do that, of course they can kill almost anything. I want to say to the Senator in a brief statement—and it answers the Senator from Missouri briefly also—that I consider this rule, if it should be adopted, of more importance than the pending bill, and I would rather have it adopted than any other concrete proposition of legislation that could be proposed here; it would be worth a special session; but the Senator must get away from the idea that by offering this amendment I am delaying matters.

The other proposed rule is debatable; it is subject to endless debate, just the same as is the bill itself. There is not any difference in it. It is amendable ten thousand times; and I am not willing to suffer under the charge that, as one of the friends of the measure, I am trying to delay it.

As I said the other night, I do not believe that we are going to be able to pass the shipping bill at this time; we are going to have a special session, anyway, whether we pass it or not. I want to get a rule of the Senate that will be permanent, that when we do come to take up the bill we can take it up or take up any other bill and come to a vote on it. That is the reason I have offered this amendment to the amendment. I consider it more important than any other measure which can be offered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin.

PROPOSED INTERNATIONAL PEACE CONFERENCE.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I interrupt the proceedings upon the pending motion to discuss briefly the joint resolution which I had the honor to submit to the Senate on the 8th of February. I send the resolution to the Secretary's desk, and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH in the chair). The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 234) authorizing the President of the United States to convey to all neutral nations the desire of this Government for an international conference for the purpose of promoting by cooperation and through its friendly offices the early cessation of hostilities and the establishment of peace among the warring nations of Europe, the clear definition of the rights of neutral nations, and for other purposes, as follows:

Whereas the most powerful nations of Europe have been engaged for over half a year in a terrible war of cumulative intensity and increasing destruction of human life; and

Whereas recent inventions have revolutionized methods of warfare, giving rise to unprecedented situations and conditions; and

Whereas the ever-widening field of hostile operations in the war zone encroaches more and more day by day upon the common highways of commerce, inviting to complications which may at any moment entangle one or more of the neutral nations in situations of the gravest peril; and

Whereas it becomes of the utmost importance that at the earliest moment a conference of the neutral nations should be called to consider the rights of neutrals under existing conditions to work out a policy for the preservation of their own peace and to tender their best offices of mediation to the belligerent nations; and

Whereas we, the people of the United States, are bound to each of the warring nations by ties of blood and country, compelling in us a profound interest in the cessation of hostilities and the restoration of peace, and, by inheritance, are best fitted to make initial appeal to each nation: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That the President be authorized to convey to all neutral nations the desire of this Government that an international conference be held for the purpose of promoting by cooperation and through its friendly offices—

First. The early cessation of hostilities and the establishment of peace among the warring nations of Europe.

Second. The consideration of uniform rules and regulations for the general limitation of armaments and the nationalization of the manufacture of all equipment and supplies used exclusively for military and naval purposes.

Third. The consideration of rules and regulations for the prohibition of the export of arms, ammunition, artillery, vessels of war, armor plate, torpedoes, or any other thing designed to be used exclusively for military and naval purposes from one country to another.

Fourth. The ultimate establishment of an international tribunal where any nation may be heard on any issue involving rights vital to its peace and the development of its national life—a tribunal whose decrees shall be enforced by the enlightened judgment of the world.

Fifth. The consideration of plans for the federation of the neutral nations and the promotion of rules and regulations which will provide for the neutralization of certain waters and maritime trade routes and such other and further action as shall establish a clear definition of the rights of neutral nations and insure, if possible, the peaceful maintenance and preservation of the sovereign rights of neutral commerce against dangers to which they are exposed through the extraordinary conditions developed by the world's greatest war.

Sixth. And for such other and further action as may tend, however remotely, to establish permanent world peace.

Resolved further, That the President be authorized to appoint commissioners to represent the United States at any such conference, whether called by the United States or any other nation.

SEC. 2. That in case such international peace conference shall be called by the United States or any other nation, the sum of $25,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the expenses of the representatives of the United States at said conference.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, four days have elapsed since that joint resolution was introduced. In that brief time I have received many letters and telegrams and there have been brought to my attention a number of editorials in support of the resolution. I ask unanimous consent that I may be permitted to print certain of these telegrams and editorials as an appendix to my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I do not purpose to speak at length on this resolution. Its object is plain. The need is urgent. Half of the world's population is at war. The heart of Europe is one great battle field.

It seems incredible that the greatest powers of the Old World could be at war for more than half a year without some definite united action on the part of neutral nations.

But it may be said in extenuation that the peace of the world was broken without warning. Stunned by the explosion, the neutral nations have looked on dazed, expecting from day to day and hoping in some vague way that a great and decisive battle with the modern enginery of war would end it as suddenly as it began. We are just coming to realize that the conflict may go on for years, with cumulative intensity and increasing destruction of human life, unless the half of the world that is neutral can, through the weight of its united appeal, without offense, find a way to lead these warring brothers back to peace.

It is estimated that by the 1st of January, in western Europe alone, more than 3,000,000 people had been rendered homeless; that more than a million of these were practically starving; that half a million men had been killed outright in battle; that more than 4,000,000 were officially reported killed, wounded, and missing; and that in the field hospitals more than 500,000 amputations had been performed. The war is adding every day not less than fifty millions of debt to be borne by coming generations. Up to January 1 it had cost seven thousand million dollars.

In our own country alone, considering all that enters into the creation, organization, and preparation of armies and navies, as well as the actual warfare for which they are designed, we have expended in the last 36 years more than $11,100,000,000. This is 72 per cent of the whole national expenditure as compared with 28 per cent spent on the civil administration of national affairs.

But no mere enumeration of the extravagant waste of money in preparation for war, and the loss of life in battle as an incident to it, can be made to measure the real cost of war.

The diversion of the energies and skill of half a dozen nations turned from useful and productive industry into an organized body of millions of men whose orders are to lay waste and destroy; the draft upon the strength and endurance of women; the orphanage of children; the destruction of life on such a scale that Governments are drafting women as "war brides," spreading broadcast the slogan "breed before you die," degrading the noblest ideals of parenthood to the rearing of children for slaughter; the serious suggestion that polygamous marriage may be encouraged at the close of the war in order to replenish its ravages—these things, in all their elemental savagery, reveal the true cost of war. It is a reversion of civilization to barbarism.

It devolves upon the peoples of the world who are not in this conflict, who can still exercise a calm and dispassionate judgment, to confer together and strive, and strive again and yet again, as the unbiased friend of each of the belligerents, to bring about a cessation of hostilities through offers of mediation.

Mediation has well been called "applied brotherhood."

Less than a year ago Argentine, Brazil, and Chile set the world a noble example in their proffer of mediation in the case of Mexico. Wholly aside from its immediate purpose, it was of inestimable value in bringing these progressive and potentially powerful sister Republics into closer and more intimate relation with our Government.

An international conference at this time, even if limited to the neutral nations of North and South America, would unify and strengthen the interrelations so fortunately established by the A. B. C. conference. But it is to be hoped that all neutral nations will respond to the call, should this or some similar resolution pass, and the President act upon the authority conferred. If some nation should for any reason decline the invitation, a convention of those desirous of participating should, nevertheless, be authorized immediately. It can not do harm by any possibility. It offers opportunity to render great and lasting service to all mankind.

Because the people of the United States are bound by ties of blood and country to all the nations involved in the conflict, it is fitting that we should take the initial step in issuing the call for such a conference.

The significance of our relations was dramatically portrayed when the call to arms came from the "old country." Men who had lived at peace as fellow citizens, neighbors, friends, working side by side as brothers, hastily departed from this their adopted land, under different flags, over different routes, to meet again in hostile camps and engage in slaughtering each other on European battle fields.

The neutrality of the United States can not and should not be that of selfish indifference. It is based on sympathetic love and understanding. As a people we are intensely interested in the cessation of a war that is slaying our kindred, bringing indescribable desolation to the lands we love and to the homes of our fathers.

We do not want to see the map of Europe changed by might of conquest. We can not believe that it is in the interest of human progress that any one of the nations should be wiped off the face of the earth. It is our inherent desire that each should preserve its natural autonomy; that each should have the largest opportunity for self-development, the largest share in the world's progress; and that each should be given, as of right, access to the highways of the sea.

It is a mistaken policy that assumes a community of nations can prosper any more than can a community of individuals by one or more tyrannizing over the others and monopolizing the world's markets. The world's greatest progress must be best served by the largest possible development of the national life of each country. We believe there is still room for all in the vast and undeveloped areas of the earth.

It is objected that the warring nations do not want peace; that they would rather fight it out even if it leads to extermination. But we do not know what they want. Underneath all the unflinching courage—and it has been wonderfully sustained—between the lines of the most defiant dispatches from the seat of war one feels from time to time a desperate paralyzing apprehension. What other meaning have these mutual threats of starvation and ultimate annihilation?

Whatever may be the mind of the belligerents regarding a termination of the war to-day, no one can say what it may be to-morrow. Certain it is that they are not so entirely engrossed in the business of destroying one another or so unreservedly confident of methods and results as to be wholly indifferent to the good opinion of the balance of the world.

During this protracted struggle each side has striven with all its might to win the sympathetic approval of the United States. To this end an unprecedented effort has been put forth through organized publicity. This anxiety of the belligerents for the support of public opinion in this country should in itself inspire us with confidence at this time.

If the nations who are locked in this death struggle feel that the approbation of a single neutral country is of so much value that they have employed every conceivable means, through powerful governmental agencies to secure it, how potent will be the moral effect of a combination of all neutral nations, backed by the united voice of 800,000,000 people, pleading with a friendly persistence that can not be denied for the cessation of hostilities and demanding a peaceable recognition of their neutral rights?

But, Mr. President, if broad humanitarian considerations do not move the neutral nations to meet in conference with a view of tendering their best offices in mediation, then, sir, I say that a proper concern for the welfare of the nations at peace makes it imperative that such a conference should be called. It is demanded for the preservation of the sovereign rights and the integrity and peace of the neutral nations of the world.

In the early weeks of this war it was the commonly expressed hope and belief that the struggle would end from sheer exhaustion within three months. But day by day the combat grows more furious and its termination more remote. And as the conflict rages each side becomes more desperate and seizes upon every possible chance for advantage, with less and less regard for the rights of neutral powers.

The use for war purposes of aeroplanes, submarines, mines, torpedoes, and deadly gaseous fumes increases the horror beyond imagination. But the introduction of these new instruments of destruction is even more alarming in that they create conditions without precedent and give warrant to a reckless disregard of regulations and restraints that heretofore have been imposed by international law upon belligerents. What follows?

The situation is filled with menace. Who can say at what moment the dark curtain that veils so much of the struggle may be swept aside by uncontrolled forces that will fasten upon the peaceful nations and draw the whole world into the vortex of war?

Great Britain assumes the right to fly our flag in self-protection. We are warned that Germany may not be able to determine whether our flag designates a neutral or an enemy. England from day to day enlarges her list of contraband and imposes conditions and exactions which well-nigh paralyze neutral commerce. Germany declares "war zones" to blockade English ports.

In an address before the governing board of the Pan American Union in December, Señor Naón, ambassador from Argentina, presented a comprehensive statement of the growing need of distinction between the rights of neutrals and the rights of belligerents. Dr. Naón is a recognized authority of the highest rank. I quote from his admirable address:

> I recognize that it would have been difficult to foresee how deeply this war was going to affect the nations of the world which, far from the councils in which European interests were discussed, find themselves nevertheless compelled to suffer the restriction of their rights and the paralysis of the essential sources of their economic development. But this situation which has been created can not continue. In addition to the general inconvenience, justice and the law which direct world relations are opposed to it. Up to the present time an explanation could be found for the development of the principles of international law in giving consideration above all to the needs of belligerents, and the accentuation of their rights, because almost the entire weight of the horrors and sorrows of war fell upon them. The interests of the neutral country were not greatly affected. At that time the activity of nations from an economic and commercial point of view was exercised with much greater independence in respect to other nations than in our day. And notwithstanding the natural hardships which a state of war might impose upon them, neither the enormous and far-reaching economic development nor the intertwining commercial relationships created by modern internationalism under the influence of scientific progress upon the industrial activity of the world had been attained.

As Dr. Naón says:

> Face to face with the rights of belligerents we now have the rights of neutrals.

The safeguards of peace require that the rights of belligerents and the rights of neutrals be clearly defined in the light of modern conditions.

Pertinent to the discussion is the following from John Bassett Moore, former counselor of the State Department, and foremost American authority on international law:

> If, instead of the naval supremacy now exercised in its own interest, and in that of its allies, by the largest consumer of our agricultural products and foodstuffs, the control of the seas were actually contested by powerful hostile fleets, it is almost appalling to reflect upon what might be the present state of our commerce. The bare suggestion of such a predicament, for the study of which conditions in the more or less distant past furnish ample materials, justifies us in giving to the subject our most serious consideration, for we must look to the future as well as to the present.

Since these lines were penned by that eminent publicist the conditions have undergone a tremendous change. The very menace of which he spoke as a possibility is now foreshadowed. Every hour the danger of these complications becomes more imminent.

Mr. President, it is imperative that the nations at peace should meet in conference for the purpose of considering the rights of neutrals under existing conditions and to work out a policy for the preservation of their own integrity and their own peace.

It is far from my intention, in offering this resolution for a conference of neutral nations, to discuss in any comprehensive way its scope and powers. The exceeding gravity of the world situation will cause every neutral power to select conferees of the highest fitness and broadest outlook. At no time in history are we likely to get a wiser, more enlightened, and advanced judgment.

There are two or three propositions which the highest authorities agree are fundamental to permanent peace. These I mention in passing.

The first, perhaps, is the limitation of armaments, and the nationalization of the manufacture of all equipment and supplies used exclusively for military and naval purposes.

Another is the prohibition of the exportation of arms, ammunition, artillery, vessels of war, armor plate, torpedoes, or anything used exclusively for military and naval purposes from one country to another.

The Secretary of Commerce reports that in the month of November, 1914, American manufacturers shipped to England cartridges valued at $1,231,235—amounting to 50,000,000 rounds. It is estimated that one soldier is killed or wounded for every thousand rounds fired in battle. Hence in one month we shipped to England enough cartridges to kill or wound 50,000 human beings.

It is revolting that we should encourage or permit traffic in arms and ammunition by private capital for profit with organized Governments, thus prompting selfish interest to influence legislation increasing appropriations in preparation for war and furnishing incentive to intrigue in domestic and foreign affairs to make a war market for private advantage.

It is repugnant to every moral sense that Governments should even indirectly be drawn into making and prosecuting a war through the machinations of those who make money by it. Yet the vast capital privately invested in plants for naval construction and the manufacture of munitions of war necessary for the equipment of armies has the strongest possible inducement to employ every means to shape conditions and influence policies which lead on to armed conflict. It means business. It means dividends. It means great accumulations of wealth in private hands to be again turned, through organization, into the building of more plants, more battleships, the manufacture of more powder, more shot and shell. In the end it has but one purpose, and that is to sacrifice human life for private gain.

Back of every big Army and Navy appropriation bill is the organized power of private interest, pressing for larger appropriations, for more battleships, more armor plate, more powder, more rifles, more machine guns, a larger standing Army, a bigger Navy; because there follows in the wake of such legislation fat Army contracts, with attendant opportunity for graft and easy money.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. With pleasure.

Mr. KENYON. I do not want to disturb the Senator, because I am in thorough sympathy with everything he has said.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. It will not disturb me at all.

Mr. KENYON. He will remember, too, in this report from the Secretary of Commerce as to munitions of war shipped abroad during the month of November, that it embraced, as I figure it out, in addition to the cartridges the Senator has spoken of, about 40,000 rifles, which have been used in some way to keep this war going on. Does not the Senator think we had better stop praying for peace in this country as long as we are shipping out these munitions of war for profit?

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Yes, Mr. President; I will say to the Senator I think it hardly consistent that we should pray for peace and at the same time supply the ammunition to continue the war. Let me say further that I am indebted to the Senator from Iowa, who has just asked the question, for calling my attention to the report of this shipment of cartridges. I did not refer to the rifles, as the cartridges illustrate the point I desired to make. The report covered only the sales for one month, and involved, as the Senator from Iowa says, a large shipment of rifles and other munitions of war.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. If it will not disturb the Senator, the remark of the Senator from Iowa reminds me that the recent disclosures of Dr. Liebnicht of the extent to which this world-wide aggregation of capital behind the manufacture and sale of war equipment had gone, and which led to a most revolting scandal in German military and naval circles, also disclosed the amazing fact that many of those who are now praying for peace were and doubtless still are interested in furnishing this equipment, and enjoy the dividends that are earned by the blood and tears of humanity.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. I quite agree, of course, with the observation of the Senator from Colorado. We have not escaped the taint which seems to creep into these Army and Navy contracts everywhere. We have had our own armor-plate scandals

Mr. President, over and over again we have heard the same arguments from the same organs of the great special interests, making their hypocritical appeals on the ground of patriotism; urging that thorough preparation for war is always a sure guaranty of peace.

What State, what city, finds security for peace and good order in allowing every man to "pack a gun"? Why have civilized communities enacted laws and ordinances prohibiting inhabitants from going about armed? States are but aggregations of individuals. Nations are but great groups of human beings. The deadly weapon within easy reach of the hand breeds a murderer. And nations armed to the teeth quickly resort to killing as a means of settling their differences.

It is agreed that the ultimate establishment of an international tribunal is an essential part of any world peace program. Just what form such a tribunal would take must be worked out by the combined wisdom of a conference of nations. My own judgment is that it should be more in the nature of a commission than a court, because international disputes should not be subject to the technicalities and delays incident to court procedure. It should be possible to call in the most eminently qualified persons to deal with the particular problem at the particular time.

Faith in the enforcement of the decrees of an international tribunal by public opinion alone has been weakened by recent developments. There is manifested a strong disposition to resort to the plan of an international police for the execution of the orders of a world tribunal. It may be that this is a necessary step in the evolution of universal peace, but I am inclined to the judgment of the late Justice Brewer, expressed at the Lake Mohonk Conference on International Arbitration some time ago. He maintained that a group of neutral nations could more effectively enforce an arbitration decree without than with military force and bloodshed. It was his view that a decree by an organized body representing all of the nations, whereby the offending nation would be cut off from intercourse with all others until it should comply, would be so drastic a force that no nation would ever allow itself to be placed in such a position.

If an alarming situation such as the one suggested by John Bassett Moore, just quoted, should develop to a stage which would practically prohibit neutral commerce, neutrals would be compelled to resort to naval convoys in order to reach the markets of the belligerents, or to declare an embargo on all trade with belligerents. In my judgment the peaceful course would be the most effective course.

Mr. President, I have not attempted to discuss in any comprehensive way the vital questions with which the proposed conference would deal. These problems the nations themselves must solve.

What stands out in bold relief is the unmistakable duty of the American Congress to authorize the President to convey to neutral nations the desire of this Government for an international conference for the purpose of promoting by cooperation and through its friendly offices the early cessation of hostilities, the establishment of peace among the warring nations of Europe, the clear definition of the rights of neutral nations, and for the other purposes to which I have briefly adverted.

Sir, it were folly to pretend that the mere calling of the proposed conference will end hostilities. But it is little short of an international crime for Congress to withhold from the President the authority and the necessary appropriation enabling him to act as the occasion shall commend itself to his expressed desire to initiate such proceeding as may, in the providence of God, aid in bringing peace to the nations now at war.

We can not longer avoid our responsibility. The balance of the world at peace waits on this Government. Neutral rights demand a clearer definition. Delay is filled with menace.

Shall we wait until other nations are drawn into the struggle? Or shall we and the neutral nations meet and make articulate the protest of the peaceful half of the world's population—a protest tempered by sympathy and affection and reason, and yet so strong and so persistent that it shall finally be heard above the roar and crash of the world's greatest war?

I ask, Mr. President, that the resolution may be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

APPENDIX.

[From the New York Sun, Tuesday, Feb. 9.]

A CONGRESS OF NEUTRALS.

The peace resolution offered in the Senate yesterday by Mr. LA FOLLETTE, and to be advocated by him in that body to-day, deserves in its general intention and scope the sympathy and support of every American—of every neutral. Putting the need of peace proposals on the sole ground of the increasing dangers of complications likely to injure neutrals or drag them into the war, which every week, almost every day, brings, that need is instant and imperative. More and more as a fiercer, more reckless, and more desperate spirit animates the warring powers their indifference to the rights and interests of neutrals grows. Be it under the irresistible instinct of self-preservation or a maddened hatred of their foes, they are constantly encroaching on neutral trade and neutral self-respect.

Of the strong and unselfish reasons—the general, obvious, humanitarian reasons—for favoring this and every other honest attempt to end the long misery and massacre of Europe it is superfluous to speak. It is enough to say that as a matter of self-protection, if from no other motive, the neutral nations may well assemble such an international conference as Mr. LA FOLLETTE proposes. Such a congress has justification and work enough, even if it deals only "with the rights of neutrals under existing conditions" and seeks only "to work out a policy for the preservation of their own peace." No harm, if no immediate or certain good, can come from the further aim of "promoting by cooperation and through friendly offices the early cessation of hostilities and the establishment of peace."

The rest of Mr. LA FOLLETTE'S irenic and international program need not now be considered. A congress of neutrals for the benefit of the rights of neutrals and for peace, if peace can be made; what well-founded objection lies to such a body for such a task?

But peace is impossible now; the powers don't want peace; at least Germany and Great Britain, the protagonists of the drama of ruin, don't want peace. As to this, remember Hosea Biglow on prophecy. The exterior port and pose of the fighters is known to the world. Their real wishes, exigencies, secret fears, and distrust are unknown. We guess that any one of them would be mighty glad to have the slaughter and the squandering cease if with no loss of "face" it could be done. Anyway it is intelligent self-interest for neutral nations to work for their own pocketbooks and security and try and stop a war into which our altruistic trans-Atlantic friends seem more and more bent on dragging them.

[From the Baltimore Sun, Wednesday, Feb. 10.]

SENATOR LA FOLLETTE'S PEACE CONFERENCE.

Senator LA FOLLETTE'S resolution proposing an international conference of neutral nations for the purpose of bringing the European war to an end, limiting armaments, establishing a tribunal for the adjudication of vital international issues, and for defining and protecting the commercial rights of noncombatant countries has much to commend it, not only as a general proposition, but as an immediate need. We can not see that there is any weighty objection to it; there is a possibility that it might do a great deal of good, and there is little danger that it would do much harm. Such a conference would, of course, have to be carefully guarded so as to keep it neutral in spirit as well as in word. The slightest suspicion of bias in any direction would not only invalidate its authority, but might arouse suspicions and jealousies that would lead to serious results. Such a danger is more or less remote, and so far as the United States is concerned it would be easy to protect ourselves from serious mistakes by making the action of our delegates dependent upon the ratification of our Government.

Necessarily a conference of this kind could speak only for the powers taking part in it, and their action at the present stage could only be advisory, except as to the commercial and other rights of neutrals. It does not seem likely that Italy, Roumania, Bulgaria, or Greece would be represented. They are all so near the "ragged edge" of the precipice that they are liable to be swept down into it at any time. Their neutrality is an armed one of "watchful waiting" at best. Holland is interested in the protection of neutral commerce, and so are Denmark and Sweden, and so far as we can see there are no apparent reasons why they should not be willing to take counsel with us along the lines indicated in Senator LA FOLLETTE'S resolution. China might send delegates, and would probably be glad to do so in view of the fact that she is the victim of every aggressor who comes her way. The South American countries could also be counted on, with a good deal of confidence, to unite in the deliberations.

But though the conference would thus necessarily be very limited and one-sided in its international aspects, it could speak with a very weighty voice on the subject of neutral trade, and possibly with a great deal of ultimate influence with regard to the other questions which it is proposed to submit to it. As to commercial freedom on the part of neutrals and their relief from the impositions and encroachments of belligerents, it might serve a very important and immediate need. They have a right to commercial life, liberty, and the pursuit of trade without the consent of warring nations, and if the latter can set off "war zones," they certainly have equal authority to demand the establishment and recognition of peace zones in which their trade will be free from the threat of danger.

It was an accidental but interesting coincidence that on the day on which Mr. LA FOLLETTE introduced his resolution in the United States Senate, Earl Grey presided at a meeting held in London to advocate an agreement among the countries of the world for the enforcement of international law. He predicted that "this logical and necessary complement of The Hague tribunal will be adopted when the nations again meet in consultation"; and a resolution was adopted by the meeting declaring it to be "imperative that a peace be established which shall secure collective responsibility by all civilized nations for the maintenance and enforcement of international law."

If the conference proposed by Senator LA FOLLETTE should be held, it would naturally be held in the United States; and though at present the prospect does not seem promising that it could bring about peace in the very near future, yet the fact that such an international body was in session might offer the very opportunity and the very agency needed for the opening of negotiations. It might be two or three months before the delegates could assemble, and by that time all the combatants may be more willing than they are now to listen to suggestions.

[From the New York Evening Post, Feb. 9.]

Senator LA FOLLETTE'S resolution authorizing the President to seek joint action by neutral nations in order to secure peace may not be got through Congress, and if it is it may not be immediately effective, but is a move in the right direction. It would be an impressive tender of good offices to the belligerent countries. None of them might accept it at first. Any sign by one of willingness to cease fighting would be taken by the others as a confession of weakness. But the resolution of Senator LA FOLLETTE goes much further than a proffer of mediation. It includes the terms of lasting peace—peace without a worm in it, in Cromwell's phrase. For the plan is to urge as an essential part of the settlement an agreement to limit armaments, to prevent the further private manufacture and private sale of arms and munitions of war, and to provide an international court before which all nations shall bind themselves to bring their grievances. The whole scheme may be said to be impracticable at present. It can scarcely be more impracticable than the war is showing itself to be. In any case, the adoption of the resolution by Congress and an earnest attempt by the President to carry it out would be a fitting sequel to the refusal of the United States to rush into big armaments at this time, and would show what power we still believe to reside in moral forces.

I earnestly hope the Senate will unanimously pass your resolution providing for an international peace conference of the neutral nations of the world. The object which you seek to accomplish is of highest importance to mankind. Even if the attempt should fail, it is still worth making. I find that people without exception are in favor of it.

MARK M. FAGAN,
Mayor Jersey City.

BOSTON, MASS., February 11, 1915.

Senator ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE,
Washington, D. C.:

I believe that a conference of neutral nations might react powerfully upon the men and women of every land who are opposed to wars of aggression, and who desire such terms of peace to prevent war as shall pave the way for lasting peace. I hope your resolution will prevail.

ELIZABETH GLENDOWER EVANS.

NEW YORK CITY, February 11, 1915.

Senator ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

I sincerely hope the peace resolution will win. It is based upon sound principles. Only through such a plan is reasonable assurance of peace possible. No measure short of what you urge can recommend itself to practical minds. Shallow measures will only prevent the progress toward a solution. The great problem involved must be met in a broad and fundamental manner. Am glad you have taken the lead in this work.

AMOS PINCHOT.

REGULATION OF IMMIGRATION—VETO MESSAGE.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Just prior to the adjournment last evening I had been calling the attention of the Senate to the decrease in the percentage of those races in the United States which were born in northern and western Europe and the unexampled increase which had occurred during the 10 years between 1900 and 1910 in the numbers of those races coming from eastern and southern Europe. I had also called attention to the fact that of the 11,000,000 immigrants who had been admitted from eastern and southern Europe in the preceding 17 years probably 75 per cent had gone directly to the industrial centers of the United States and were to be found in our cities. Conditions in the cities had not been so much changed when President Cleveland interposed his veto against a similar bill in 1897.

He said:

It can not be shown, however, that it affects all cities, nor that it is permanent—

He is speaking about the influx of men of foreign nations—

nor does it appear that this condition, where it exists, demands as its remedy the reversal of our present immigration policy.

The fact that the increase in the population of our cities has largely come by reason of foreign immigration during the last two decades has been sharply challenged in debate in this body during the present session. For that reason I beg leave to call the attention of the Senate to some facts which I have gleaned from the census of 1910, and among them the following: I find that in 1900, 64.6 per cent of all those born abroad residing in New England and the Middle Atlantic States of New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey were in the cities, and I find that 10 years later, in 1910, 70 per cent of the foreign born in that vast territory were found in the cities. The same authority states that in the Middle Atlantic States, New York, Pennsylvania, and New Jersey, 83.9 per cent of the foreign-born population were found in the cities. Going to the New England States and considering them alone, it is found that 92.4 per cent of the entire foreign-born population are residents in the great centers of society.

I quote from the census of 1910, volume 1, page 171, where it is stated that—

The conditions in the New England and Middle Atlantic divisions are especially noteworthy. Only about one-third (33.9 and 34.4 per cent, respectively) of the urban population of these divisions in 1910 consisted of native whites of native parentage, while over two-thirds of the rural population (69.8 per cent and 67 per cent, respectively) were of that class. Broadly speaking, of the urban population of these divisions almost one-third were foreign-born whites, fully one-third (including persons of mixed parentage) were native children of foreign-born whites, and about one-third were native whites of native parentage.

In this connection it is interesting to note that in this rapid movement of the foreign-born population toward the centers there has been a vast increase in the population of the cities as contrasted with the population of the rural districts. The census of 1880 showed that only 29½ per cent of the entire population of the United States were in the cities, while the census of 1910, 30 years later, shows that 46.3 per cent of the entire population were found in the cities. It also shows that the increase in the urban population during the period from 1900 to 1910 was 11,013,738, or 38.8 per cent, while in the rural sections of the country the increase is only 4,963,953, or 11 per cent. In other words, the increase in the population of the cities of the United States was more than three times as great in percentage as the increase of the population in the rural districts.

It has also been claimed, Mr. President, in this debate that the growth of the cities was more to be accounted for by the migration from the country districts to the city than by the movement of the immigrant class toward such centers. To show that such is not the fact I have selected the 10 principal cities of the United States, and beg to quote from the census regarding them.

It appears from the census of 1910 that during the 10 preceding years the increase in the native white population of New York City was 30 per cent, while the increase in the foreign population of that city was 52.9 per cent.

In Chicago the native white population increased 25.5 per cent; the foreign-born population, 33.4 per cent.

In Philadelphia the native white population increased 15.5 per cent; the foreign-born population, 30.3 per cent.

In St. Louis the increase in the native white was 20.6 per cent, while that of the foreign born was only 13.3 per cent.

In Boston the increase in the native white population was 17.5 per cent, while that in the foreign-born population was 23.5 per cent.

In Cleveland the increase in the native white was 41.7 per cent; that of the foreign-born white 57.4 per cent.

In Baltimore the increase in the native white was 9.7 per cent, and 13.4 per cent of the foreign-born white.

In Pittsburgh the increase in the first class was 16.3 per cent; that of the foreign-born white 22.7 per cent.

In Detroit the increase in the native white was 63.5 per cent and in the foreign born 63 per cent, while in Buffalo the increase in native white was 23 per cent and in the foreign-born white it was only 13.1 per cent.

From this table it appears that the increase in population among the foreign born in the larger cities has been much greater than in the country, the exceptions being St. Louis, Detroit, and Buffalo, the difference in Detroit not being appreciable.

But, to throw still greater light upon this question, I want further to quote from the census of 1910, from which it appears that in that year in New York City the percentage of those of native parentage was only 19.3 per cent. In Chicago those born of native parents was 20.4 per cent; in Philadelphia, 37.7 per cent; in St. Louis, 39.3 per cent; in Boston, 23.5 per cent; in Cleveland, 23.6 per cent; in Baltimore, 46.8 per cent; in Pittsburgh, 33 per cent; in Detroit, 24.7 per cent; and in Buffalo, 28.2 per cent.

Now, going to some of the manufacturing cities of the country, I call attention to the fact that those of native-born parentage residing in Lowell, Mass., constituted only 19.5 per cent of the population of the city; in Paterson, N. J., 22.6 per cent; in Providence, R. I., 26.7 per cent; in Worcester, Mass., 28.4 per cent; in Rochester, N. Y., 34.2 per cent; in Brockton, Mass., 45.5 per cent; in Lawrence, 13.6 per cent; and in Waterbury, Conn., 24.9 per cent.

In connection with this statement I ask leave to insert tables taken from the census which not only give the information which I have stated but also give the percentages of those of foreign birth and those whose parents, one or the other of them, were foreign born. It is a most interesting table and one to which some Senators may wish to refer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SAULSBURY in the chair). Without objection leave will be granted.

The tables referred to are as follows:

RESTRICTION NOT A NEW POLICY.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. But President Wilson based his veto upon the fact that this bill is what he denominates a radical departure from the well-established policy of the Government. I hardly think that statement is correct; but even if it be correct, does it furnish a basis for a veto of a measure of this character at this time?

I think he must have overlooked the fact that for 20 years the Nation has been demanding just this type of legislation; he must have overlooked the fact that 30 years ago we began the restrictive policy in the adoption of the contract-labor law, and we adopted that law because we did not want unfair competition against the labor element of the United States by those coming from foreign nations. That law was intended, undoubtedly, more to protect the skilled labor of the United States than any other, because at that time the demands for common labor had not become as great as later on; but, nevertheless, the principle of restriction was just as firmly asserted in that legislation as it is in the legislation the purpose of which is to restrict in some measure the flow of immigration into this country at the present time, consisting as it does of unskilled common or farm labor, among the males to the extent of 90 per cent of the whole, competing as it does with the common labor of this country at all the great centers of our industries, and in such a way as to reduce the earning capacity of this class of wage earners and to destroy the American standard of living.

The restrictive legislation of 1885 to which I have referred is found rewritten in the bill which has been vetoed. It is known as the contract-labor clause. Among the excluded classes are "persons hereinafter called contract laborers, who have been induced, assisted, encouraged, or solicited to migrate to this country by offers or promises of employment, whether such offers or promises are true or false, or in consequence of agreements, oral, written or printed, express or implied, to perform labor in this country of any kind, skilled or unskilled; persons who have come in consequence of advertisements for laborers printed, published, or distributed in a foreign country."

That, Mr. President, in substance, was the legislation adopted 30 years ago, and was absolutely restrictive in its character and was based upon the rights of the United States in the protection of its own citizens and their well-being to forbid the solicitation and the bringing into this country of men who would actually compete against the laboring men of this country in the labor market of the Nation.

So then a restrictive measure when applied to common labor stands upon precisely the same principle, a principle that has been recognized by this Government, and one which has been in operation during the last three decades of its history.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Vermont yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. STERLING. The Senator from Vermont may intend to cover in his discussion the point to which I should like to call his attention.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. STERLING. The President, as the Senator will recall, places his objection to the bill on two grounds, the first of which is in the following language, quoting from the President's message:

> It seeks to all but close entirely the gates of asylum which have always been open to those who could find nowhere else the right and opportunity of constitutional agitation for what they conceived to be the natural and inalienable rights of men.

The question I should like to ask the Senator is, what particular language of the bill is referred to by the President here?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Such language does not exist. Mr. President. I know of no language in the bill which will bear that construction.

Mr. STERLING. Does not the present law exclude anarchists or persons who believe in or advocate the overthrow by force or violence of government?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. It does; and the present bill strengthens that law and makes it much more effective.

I want to say in connection with the Senator's inquiry that this bill, in addition to the literacy test, embraces all the recommendations that were made by the Immigration Commission of 1907, no one of which has ever as yet been enacted into law, sadly as they are needed, simply because President Taft, on the recommendation of a Cabinet officer, vetoed the former bill and because the veto in this case has been interposed by President Wilson. The country has been waiting for the last four years for legislation that will strengthen the existing law and make it more effective. The President admits this in his message, because he says it has many admirable features.

I have a list of the many recommendations which I might incorporate in my remarks except for the time it would take to read them, but I state broadly that all the advantages intended to have flowed from the action of the Immigration Commission, which gave three years of hard study to this work and gathered a fund of information which had never before been brought together on this subject in the history of our legislation. All, I say, of the commission's recommendations have been incorporated in this bill, and they go down with the literacy test. Speaking in reply to the inquiry of the Senator from South Dakota as to the right of asylum, let me add that the bill itself provides:

> That nothing in this act shall exclude, if otherwise admissible, persons convicted of an offense purely political, not involving moral turpitude.

The right of asylum is fully protected in this measure.

GROWTH OF PUBLIC SENTIMENT.

Mr. President, in 1889 there was a strong and increasing interest in this question of immigration. One political party or the other in 23 different States had placed in their platforms a plank demanding a more rigid execution of the laws and the adoption of additional measures for the purposes of regulating and restricting immigration. And yet at that time the new immigration, as we style it, that was coming from eastern and southern Europe had not amounted to a million souls, but it was coming in largely increasing numbers. We had then admitted only about 700,000, but even that number had aroused the attention of thinking men. Both legislators and people were startled by the fact that the census of 1890 showed that in the last decade the increase in the native-born citizens of this country had been only 22.1 per cent, while the increase in the percentage of those born abroad had been 31.7 per cent.

I ought to say in this connection that in 1888 a report had been made by what was known as the Ford committee, appointed under authority of Congress, recommending many amendments intended to strengthen the law. The bill so recommended did not become a law, but Congress became deeply interested in the question.

THE SITUATION AT THAT TIME.

I now read from the report of the Immigration Commission:

> The subject of immigration continued to be a matter of interest, and in 1889 a standing Committee on Immigration in the Senate and a select Committee on Immigration and Naturalization in the House were established. In 1890 these committees were authorized jointly to make an inquiry relative to immigration and to investigate the workings of the various laws of the United States and of the several States relative to immigration.

The importance the country attached to legislation upon this subject will be understood when it is remembered that a standing committee of this body was instituted, and a similar one in the House.

The commission proceed by saying:

> Various reports were submitted, and the conclusion of the committee was that a radical change in the immigration laws was not advisable, although it had been found that throughout the country there existed a demand for a stricter enforcement of the immigration laws. During 1890 one or more political parties in 23 States had demanded additional regulations of immigration.

Then they go on to say what the investigation of the joint committee was, and they state that—

> The bill presented by the committee aimed to correct faults in existing law. As it was presented it received rather general favor, the only opposition to it being on the part of ultrarestrictionists, who tried to have substituted a bill which raised the head tax from 50 cents to $1 and provided for a thorough consular examination.

As a result of this agitation Congress in 1891 adopted an act concerning which the commission speak as follows:

> The contract-labor law was strengthened by prohibiting the encouragement of immigration by promises of employment through advertisements published in any foreign country, and transportation companies were forbidden to solicit or encourage immigration.

I ask leave, to save time at this point, to quote further from the report bearing upon that subject, on page 571.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the leave is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

> Under the law of 1891 the office of Superintendent of Immigration was authorized, and for the first time Federal control of immigration was completely and definitely established, United States officials exercising the functions which under the law of 1882 had been delegated to the States. It now became the duty of the commanding officer of every vessel bringing alien immigrants to report to the proper inspection officials the name, nationality, last residence, and destination of all such aliens; all decisions of the inspection officials refusing any alien the right to land were final unless appeal was taken to the Secretary of the Treasury; the medical examination of immigrants at United States ports was to be made by surgeons of the United States Marine-Hospital Service; and for the first time an inspection of immigrants on the borders of Canada and Mexico was provided for.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. The bill presented as the result of the committee's work passed the House of Representatives by a vote of 125 to 48, and passed this body unanimously. That was a bill markedly in advance of anything that had been previously enacted looking toward the restriction of immigration.

Returning again to the question of restriction of immigration let us inquire whether the literacy test is new, as the President seems to think it is, and whether it is a radical departure, as he says, from the policy of the Government. He is not sure that the people have ever heard of or seriously considered it as a policy and bases his action in vetoing this bill upon the assumption that such a proposition has never been sharply called to their attention. He seems not to have known that as early as 1892 this very test was demanded.

Let me read from volume 2, page 572, what the commission say:

The other bill presented by the Senate committee is interesting in that for the first time restriction of immigration by means of an educational test was recommended by a congressional committee.

The report goes on to tell how the proposition was presented, what lines the debate took, and states that although the bill failed of passage a board of inquiry was constituted by Congress to further investigate the matter and report.

The President seems also to be unaware of the fact that, following that agitation and the filing of the report of that board of inquiry, both of the great political parties of the Nation demanded through their national conventions restrictive legislation of positive type. The people also demanded such legislation, and at the polls emphasized such demands. I called attention last evening, I think, to the platforms of the two great parties of this country in that year; but let me repeat. The Democratic Party in its national platform said:

We hold that the most efficient way of protecting American labor is to prevent the importation of foreign pauper labor to compete with it in the home market.

To what did they refer as pauper labor? It was this new immigration of which we had received in all perhaps a million souls from eastern and southern Europe.

The Republican national platform of the same year contains this clause:

For the protection of the quality of our American citizenship and of the wages of our workingmen against the fatal competition of low-priced labor, we demand that the immigration laws be thoroughly enforced and so extended as to exclude from entrance to the United States those who can neither read nor write.

It is apparent that President Wilson is unacquainted with the political history of that period. He challenges Congress with the direct inquiry, "Has any political party ever avowed a policy of restriction in this fundamental matter—gone to the country on it and been commissioned to control legislation?"

Yes, Mr. President, the Republican Party did this in 1896. It not only declared for a reading test but for a test embracing the ability to both write and read. They went to the country on it, and in the election which followed were commissioned to control legislation by an overwhelming plurality. Heeding the voice of the people, an immigration bill in 1896 was adopted by both branches of Congress the chief feature of which was the reading and writing test, and this went to President Cleveland during the last days of his administration, and it was returned with his veto on the very day before he went out of office—March 3. And yet, in spite of the shortness of time in which to do so, that bill was taken up by the House of Representatives and passed over the President's veto by a vote of 193 to 37; but no action could be taken upon it in the Senate because of the expiration of the Congress by limitation of law.

It is evident, Mr. President, that the policy of restriction is not new, either to the American people or the American Congress; and I may add incidentally that two years later the Senate of the United States passed another measure containing the literacy test, but that bill failed to receive consideration in the other House because of the pressure of business connected with the War with Spain. Let me again quote the language of the President, when he says:

Does this bill rest upon the conscious and universal assent and desire of the American people? I doubt it. It is because I doubt it that I make bold to dissent from it. I am willing to abide by the verdict, but not until it has been rendered. Let the platforms of parties speak out upon this policy and the people pronounce their wish. The matter is too fundamental to be settled otherwise.

Surely the historic facts to which I have called attention must have been overlooked by President Wilson when he penned the lines which I have quoted from his veto message. It is still more remarkable that he is avowedly unwilling to admit that the present Congress fairly represents the thought, feeling, and opinion of the people, though its Members have been in the main selected through the medium of direct elections by the people to whom he refers. But if we must go back to party platforms to ascertain public sentiment, it still appears that the country has already spoken upon this question, and spoken emphatically.

IS RESTRICTION NECESSARY?

Now, Mr. President, I propose to discuss for a little while the question whether or not a general restriction of immigration has become necessary. In doing so I want to say that the Immigration Commission, which recommended this as the one most feasible method of reducing the number of the least desirable classes of immigrants, did not do so with any prejudice against any nationality, against any religious faith, against any class or condition of people that was mentally, physically, and morally sound. They based their recommendation upon the ground that the supply of common labor in the United States was so great that the immigrants were not only competing successfully against American labor but were competing against themselves as well, and to such a degree that they were securing for themselves labor only for a portion of the time, as the result of which they were compelled to live under un-American conditions.

But, coming back to this question, is it necessary? And if necessary in the case of skilled labor, why is it not necessary in the case of unskilled labor if there is such an oversupply that it is creating the same danger that the contract skilled labor would produce if permitted to come in. Mr. President, we want a sufficient number of this class of immigrants to do the rough work of the country. As a rule, the recent immigration represents conditions which can only be improved by coming to this country. We want them in proper numbers, and I am glad to say that in point of age they are admirable. It is undoubtedly true that 85 per cent of those whom we admit are between the ages of 14 and 45, and are capable of doing good work. They are subjected to strict medical examinations. In that way we have succeeded in eliminating those who suffer from diseases that can readily be detected. It is unfortunate, however, that in rejecting the reading test the President has also rejected the most important of the medical examinations—that relating to the mental conditions.

Everybody knows that in the nations of Europe most highly civilized there will be found the highest percentage of insanity, and the evidence taken before the Immigration Commission shows that one of the greatest evils with which we have now to contend is that so many of the aliens admitted become insane and that the asylums in New York and in other seaport cities are unduly crowded with this class. This bill contains a provision for examinations by experts on insanity, and that provision goes down under this veto with every other proposed amendment to existing law that was recommended by the Immigration Commission as a result of their three years' work.

I repeat that we want as many of these people as are necessary to fairly do the work of the country; but it is a cruelty to them as well as to our own people to allow them to come in such numbers as that they will overcrowd one another, as we think they have done.

THE IMMIGRATION COMMISSION—ITS ORGANIZATION AND WORK.

Returning to the question of restrictive immigration legislation, let me say that in 1907 there was a general revision of the immigration laws. The bill was one which I had the honor to introduce in this body. I did not in that bill, as I presented it, include the literacy test. As I have frequently stated, I entered the Senate with the conviction that this country was large enough and broad enough and its resources of such magnitude that we would be able to properly care for and assimilate all who would naturally seek admission as immigrants. I was really very much opposed to the literacy test until subsequent study convinced me that it had become vitally necessary. So, I say, when I introduced the bill which became the law in 1907, it did not contain the literacy test; but on the floor of the Senate it was offered—I think by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]—as an amendment, and was adopted. The bill went to the House, where that provision was eliminated that there might be a full and impartial investigation of immigration conditions before final action was taken in that direction. The following amendment was substituted for it:

That a commission is hereby created, consisting of three Senators, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, and three Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and three persons, to be appointed by the President of the United States. Said commission shall make full inquiry, examination, and investigation by subcommittee or otherwise into the subject of immigration. For the purpose of said inquiry, examination, and investigation, said commission is authorized to send for persons and papers, make all necessary travel, either in the United States or any foreign country, and, through the chairman of the commission or any member thereof, to administer oaths and to examine witnesses and papers respecting all matters pertaining to the subject, and to employ necessary clerical and other assistance. Said commission shall report to the Congress the conclusions reached by it and make such recommendations as in its judgment may seem proper. Such sums of money as may be necessary for the said inquiry, examination, and investigation are hereby appropriated and authorized to be paid out of the "immigrant fund" on the certificate of the chairman of said commission, including all expenses of the commissioners and a reasonable compensation, to be fixed by the President of the United States, for those members of the commission who are not Members of Congress.

It will be seen that an immigration commission with broad powers was provided for, and no limit was placed upon the expense which it might incur in making that study. It consisted of three Senators, appointed by the Vice President, three Members of the House of Representatives, appointed by the Speaker of the House, and three civilians, selected by the President.

The commission at first consisted of Senators DILLINGHAM of Vermont, LODGE of Massachusetts, McLaurin of Mississippi, all of whom were members of the Senate Committee on Immigration. Mr. McLaurin, on his own motion, was excused, and Senator Latimer, of South Carolina, who was also a member of that committee, was appointed in his stead. The Speaker of the House appointed Mr. Howell, of New Jersey; Mr. Bennet, of New York; and Mr. BURNETT, of Alabama. Mr. Howell was the chairman, and the other members on the part of the House of Representatives on the commission were members of the Committee on Immigration of the House of Representatives.

The President of the United States appointed Hon. Charles P. Neill, of Texas, who was then United States Commissioner of Labor; Prof. Jeremiah W. Jenks, of Cornell University; and Mr. William R. Wheeler, of California. After the death of Senator Latimer, Senator Percy, of Mississippi, took his place. That constituted the membership of the commission which made these inquiries.

The general scope of the commission's work is well stated on page 14 of their report, as follows:

The main subjects considered in the European inquiry were as follows:

1. Causes of emigration, natural and artificial.
2. Economic conditions in Europe and the effect on emigration to the United States.
3. Steamship companies and their agents as factors in promoting emigration.
4. Classes and character of European emigrants.
5. Emigration of criminals.
6. Attitude of European Governments toward emigration.
7. Laws of the various countries respecting emigration and emigrants.
8. Effect of the United States immigration law in preventing the embarkation of undesirable emigrants.
9. Medical examination of intending emigrants at ports of embarkation and elsewhere, and practicability of having such examinations made by United States medical officers.
10. United States consular officers as a factor in regulating immigration.
11. International regulation of emigration and immigration.

The following was the plan adopted for the work in the United States:

The plan of work under which the field investigations of the commission were carried on contemplated an extensive inquiry into the status of the new immigrants and including the following subjects:

1. Congestion of immigrants in New York, Chicago, Boston, and other large cities.
2. Immigrants as industrial workers in the leading industries, including effect on wages, employment of native-born workers, conditions of work, etc.
3. Effect of recent immigration on wages and other conditions in various trades, from the standpoint of native-born and older immigrant workers in such trades.
4. Progress of immigrant industrial workers.
5. Recent immigrants as residents of industrial communities.
6. Recent immigrants in agriculture.
7. Immigrant children and the children of immigrants in schools.
8. Extent of which recent immigrants and their children are becoming assimilated or Americanized and agencies promoting or retarding Americanization.
9. The physical assimilation of immigrants.
10. Alien criminality.
11. Immigrants in penal and reformatory institutions.
12. Immigrants in institutions for the insane.
13. Immigrants as charity seekers in various cities.
14. Immigrants in charity hospital.

Other features included in the commission's plan of work and which required the collection of original data through field agents were:

1. An inquiry concerning the importation of women for immoral purposes—the "white-slave" traffic.

I may say in this connection that the report which I presented to the Senate upon that subject was the beginning of the movement in this country against that great evil.

2. An investigation of immigrant homes, aid societies, and employment agencies.
3. An investigation of the immigrant bank system, which included also an inquiry relative to the amount of money sent abroad by immigrants.
4. An investigation of conditions under which immigrants are carried at sea.

I omit reading other classes of information that was sought by the commission because of the time it would take to do so and the space it would occupy in the RECORD, but it may be found on pages 15 and 16 of volume 1 of these reports.

FINDINGS AND REPORTS OF COMMISSION.

These reports as completed constitute 41 volumes substantially of the size of the volume I hold in my hand [exhibiting], a summary of all the reports being found in the first two volumes, from one of which I am now reading. In pursuing their work and in securing the information desired the commission's agents came in contact with more than 3,200,000 individuals.

I want to call attention to what the commission have to say regarding the two principal types of immigration, which will be found on page 23 of volume 1. They say:

From 1820 to 1883 more than 95 per cent of the total immigration from Europe originated in the United Kingdom, Germany, Scandinavia, the Netherlands, Belgium, France, and Switzerland. In what follows the movement from these countries will be referred to as the "old immigration." Following 1883 there was a rapid change in the ethnical character of European immigration, and in recent years more than 70 per cent of the movement has originated in southern and eastern Europe. The change geographically, however, has been somewhat greater than the change in the racial character of the immigration, this being due very largely to the number of Germans who have come from Austria-Hungary and Russia. The movement from southern and eastern Europe will be referred to as the "new immigration." In a single generation Austria-Hungary, Italy, and Russia have succeeded the United Kingdom and Germany as the chief sources of immigration. In fact, each of the three countries first named furnished more immigrants to the United States in 1907 than came in the same year from the United Kingdom, Germany, Scandinavia, France, the Netherlands, Belgium, and Switzerland combined.

Then the commission discusses the old and the new immigration in a general way, and says:

The old immigration movement in recent years has rapidly declined, both numerically and relatively, and under present conditions there are no indications that it will materially increase. The new immigration movement is very large, and there are few, if any, indications of its natural abatement. The new immigration, coming in such large numbers, has provoked a widespread feeling of appr hension as to its effect on the economic and social welfare of the country. Because of this the commission's investigations have been mainly directed toward a study of its general status as part of the population of the country.

The old immigration movement was essentially one of permanent settlers. The new immigration is very largely one of individuals a considerable proportion of whom apparently have no intention of permanently changing their residence, their only purpose in coming to America being to temporarily take advantage of the greater wages paid for industrial labor in this country. This, of course, is not true of all the new immigrants, but the practice is sufficiently common to warrant referring to it as a characteristic of them as a class. From all data that are available it appears that nearly 40 per cent of the new immigration movement returns to Europe, and that about two-thirds of those who go remain there. This does not mean that all of these immigrants have acquired a competence and returned to live on it. Among the immigrants who return permanently are those who have failed, as well as those who have succeeded. Thousands of those returning have, under unusual conditions of climate, work, and food, contracted tuberculosis and other diseases.

Further on the commission says:

The old immigration came to the United States during a period of general development and was an important factor in that development, while the new immigration has come during a period of great industrial expansion and has furnished a practically unlimited supply of labor to that expansion.

As a class, the new immigrants are largely unskilled laborers coming from countries where the highest wage is small compared with the lowest wage in the United States.

I may say, in passing, that when I was in Europe with the commission, substantially one-fourth of the entire immigration to the United States came from Italy, and we there learned that the men who constituted that vast immigration from southern Italy were almost wholly farm laborers and until the emigration movement began had never received more than 25 cents a day for their labor; but owing to the vast number who had come to this country the price had advanced, so that the landowners were then paying substantially 40 cents a day for labor. I proceed with the reading:

About 83 per cent are between the ages of 14 and 45 years, and consequently are producers rather than dependents. They bring little money into the country and send or take a considerable part of their earnings out. More than 35 per cent are illiterate, as compared with less than 3 per cent of the old immigrant class.

It is upon that statement of the percentage of illiteracy that the recommendation for the reading test is based. The reading test will but little affect England, Ireland, Scotland, Germany, the Scandinavian States, and Belgium, because, as here stated, the degree of illiteracy among immigrants from these countries is less than 3 per cent; but it will naturally affect the classes of common laborers who come in such vast numbers from eastern and southern Europe as to overcrowd our labor markets. It is a test intended to produce restriction.

INCREASE OF NEW IMMIGRATION.

To what extent has this immigration grown? Is restriction desirable? I have in my hands voluminous tables showing the immigration from Europe, including Asian Turkey, since 1882 by periods, the countries named in order by periods, under division, including the countries in southern and eastern Europe furnishing the greater part of the recent immigration, and countries of western and northern Europe furnishing what is called the old immigration.

It should be remembered that between 1820 and 1882 we had received about 9,000,000 aliens, about 5,000,000 coming prior to the Civil War, and this included the great Irish immigration resulting from the potato famine in Ireland, as well as the German immigration which followed the Civil War, during which time occurred a marvelously great development of the agricultural area of the Central West.

From these tables it appears that in the period 1882 to 1889 the old immigration admitted numbered 3,019,696 and the new immigration only 708,357, making a total of 3,728,053. Now, mark the increase during the next seven years, from 1890 to 1896, inclusive. The new immigration had increased in number and the old immigration had decreased, so that there was very little difference between the two, the old immigration amounting to 1,562,797 and the new immigration to 1,194,189, which combined makes a total of 2,756,986.

But it appears that between 1897 and 1914, a period of 18 years, there was an unprecedented increase in the volume of alien immigration, particularly among the races constituting the new immigration. During that period the old immigration amounted to only 2,983,548, while the new immigration from eastern and southern Europe jumped to 10,057,576.

To recapitulate, the total old immigration for the period of 33 years from 1882 to 1914 has been only 7,566,041, while the total new immigration for the period of 33 years has been 11,960,122. So that the total immigration from Europe, old and new, during that period has been over 19,500,000 souls.

It is utterly impossible that the Nation can receive in so short a time almost 12,000,000 immigrants from non-English speaking nations, over 90 per cent of whom are common laborers, without feeling its influence and without noting a strong impress upon labor and social conditions in the country; and it was because of the changed conditions which the commission discovered in its investigations that the recommendation has been made for the adoption of some measure of restriction.

In this connection, Mr. President, I ask leave to insert in the RECORD such portions of the tables which I hold in my hand as may be deemed necessary to illustrate the text.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. It is very commonly stated that we have not sufficiently guarded the rights of those of foreign nations who seek an asylum in this country, and it is intimated, if not asserted, that a very large proportion of the classes that have been coming have been impelled to do so by political or religious persecution; but the commission did not find that to be the fact. They found that in every instance where they came in contact with the different classes of the new immigration such classes had emigrated to improve their general living conditions. They were induced to come by reason of information received from this country indicating that wages were high; that conditions were favorable; that their advantages would be greater, and in a general way that it would be to their advantage to make the change. They have come to take advantage of these conditions, and for no other purpose. They have returned to their homes in large numbers, as they would not have otherwise done.

I have taken pains to examine the outward movement of these classes from this country during the year 1914, and I find that one out of five of the Armenians, who are supposed to have been more oppressed, perhaps, by Turkey than the people of any other part of Europe—I find that one in five of all who came have returned. Of the Hebrews, I find that in the year 1914, 4,147 returned to Russia on their own motion, willingly and freely; and of the Poles I find that 18,779 returned voluntarily to Russia; and that of the 10,000 Finns 2,250, or one in four, returned. Coming to Austria, and looking at the movement of the Croatians and the Slovenians, who are Slavic races under the domination of Austria, I found that 8,500 went back in the year 1914, substantially one-half of the number coming of that class, and so in the case of Hungary, the Slovaks, who are a Slavic race upon which the Hungarian language is being forced, one of the poorest people of Europe, I found in 1914 that one in three of the number received were returning to their home country. Everything points to the fact that these people have sought admission to the United States because of our superior industrial conditions.

A fact which I think I have before mentioned strengthens my opinion that such is the case, to wit: That 80 per cent of all of whom I am now speaking, who landed at Ellis Island in a full year, had in their possession when they landed railroad tickets from New York to the point of their destination, which indicates that their coming was the result of correspondence and prearrangement with friends already in the United States. Moreover, 94 per cent of all admitted that year reported that they were going to join friends or relatives. This shows for what purpose they had come as well as the agencies through which their journeys had been arranged.

MANUFACTURES AND MINING.

Now, Mr. President, I propose to spend a little time in discussing the work of the commission in its investigation of conditions in the manufactures and in the mining industries of the country, because it was in such investigations that we received the information upon which we based our findings. That investigation was thoroughly organized and covered 37 of the principal industries of the country east of the Rocky Mountains. In pursuing it the commission's agents came in personal touch with 620,000 individual workers. They went into 200 different industrial communities, and made an intensive study of the family conditions in the case of 23,000 families. Of all with whom they came in contact in all the industries of America, 60 per cent were foreign born, and 15 per cent belonged to the second generation. There were only about 20 per cent of Americans of native-born parents employed either in manufacturing or in mining. The leading races so employed were as follows, the number of each being in the order named: Poles, south Italians, north Italians, Hungarians, Lithuanians, and Croatians.

In that investigation we tried to find a really American industrial community, one in which native-born Americans predominated in number, but failed to find such a community at the seats of any of our basic industries.

In the exhaustive investigation of the iron and steel industry the commission's agents came in contact with 86,000 individuals, of whom 57.7 per cent were foreign born and 13.4 per cent were their sons; so that 71.1 per cent of all the employees were either born abroad or were the children of those born abroad. I propose before I finish to give some statistics showing the extent of their employment and the extent of their annual incomes; but before doing so I want to state the net results coming from the investigation of the iron and steel industry.

We found that the average weekly wages paid to the men were not the subject of complaint. They amounted to $14.75 per week; and had the men had constant employment during the year they would have received upon the average $750 as the result of the year's work. As a matter of fact, however, we found that the 86,000 men averaged to receive only $326 instead of the $750, which they would have received at the prevailing rate of wages had they been employed all the time. It indicated that they had employment only one-half the time, upon an average. This results from the fact that the employers carry a large number of men upon the pay roll in order that there may be no shortage of help in case of rush orders; when work is quiet they are able to lay off those not needed and the men are compelled to be idle. In the iron and steel industry this condition prevailed to a greater extent than in any other industry examined; and that furnishes the reason why the amount received upon an average by each of these employees amounted to only $326.

Because of the overcrowded condition of the labor market it appears that the men employed in the bituminous coal industry and in the manufacture of silk and woolens in the United States were compelled to remain idle about one-third of the time; those engaged in the manufacture of leather, clothing, and in oil refining, one-fourth of the time; while those employed in the manufacture of cotton, boots and shoes, and sugar were compelled to lose about one-fifth of their time.

Returning to a consideration of conditions in the steel and iron industries in the Middle West, the commission says:

> In the steel mills of this community it is found that positions of trust and those calling for skilled labor, such as clerks, draftsmen, foremen, switchmen, teamsters, and watchmen, are filled by the Americans, Germans, and Irish, while the positions for unskilled labor, such as unloading, floating gang, etc., are filled by negroes, Poles, Bulgarians, and Macedonians. In the smelting departments the skilled and responsible positions, such as melters, ladlemen, charging-machine men, bricklayers, and chemists, are filled by Americans, Germans, and Irish; while the positions calling for unskilled labor are occupied by Bulgarians and Slovaks. The same is true of the molding departments, where the foundry men, molders, foremen, and carpenters are Americans, Germans, and Irish, and the rammers, helpers, and common laborers are Macedonians, Bulgarians, and Armenians. In the pattern department no races but Americans and Germans are employed, as all the labor in this department is skilled.
> In the machinery and power department practically the same condition prevails, as all the occupations, such as blacksmiths, mechanics, pattern makers, electricians, pipe fitters, etc., call for skilled labor, and are occupied by Americans, Irish, and Germans. In the finishing department, where both skilled and unskilled labor is employed, the Americans, Germans, and Irish have the positions calling for skilled labor and the Macedonians, Bulgarians, Turks, Roumanians, and negroes the positions requiring only unskilled labor.

RELATIONS BETWEEN THE RACES.

Regarding the relations between the races, I call attention to a statement in volume 9, page 66, which sheds some light upon conditions:

> In addition to not freely associating with one another, there is considerable friction between the Irish, Austrians, and Magyars on the one hand, and the Macedonians, Bulgarians, Roumanians, and other southeastern European and oriental races on the other hand growing out of the conditions under which employment is given. The unskilled and less skilled employees of the steel companies gather each morning at the gates of the different plants and are designated for work by the foremen. There is not much competition between the races so far as unskilled labor is concerned. The southeastern European peoples may be said to be practically without competition there. In the occupations which require some skill, however, and to which a large number of Macedonians and Bulgarians have attained, there is considerable direct competition. The Irish, Magyars, and Austrians frequently adopt the policy of driving the newcomers by force away from the mill gates. Oftentimes the recent arrivals resent such action and a general fight along racial lines ensues, the weapons employed being fists, stones and other missiles, and in some cases revolvers. This tendency is, of course, much intensified in seasons of slack employment or curtailment of work.

And this, Mr. President, is what the commission found:

> The immigrants, except the English, Germans, Irish, and Welsh, do not associate freely with the natives, but stay largely in the colonies of their fellow countrymen. There is a general dislike on the part of the English-speaking races for the "foreigner."
> The Magyars, Poles, and Slovaks are brought more or less into contact with American people and their habits of living. Their children attend the public schools, and they sometimes join trade-unions. With the Bulgarians, Roumanians, and Armenians the situation is different. A few representative men among editors, mercantile proprietors, and educated men live in American sections according to American standards, but the majority of these races are either unmarried or without their families in this country. Very few attend school or are receiving instruction in English. Practically none are members of labor unions. In their present mode of living they have little contact with American churches, schools, or business houses.

EARNING CAPACITY.

I wish now to refer to the entire body of employees in the manufacturing and mining industries of the United States with whom the agents came in contact, and to speak of the thrift, industry, and the earning capacity of these classes. Generally speaking, I find the statement in volume 1, page 413, to be correct. The statement is that upon comparing the yearly incomes of the two classes of immigrants it is seen that the highest average shown by any race of recent immigration is below the lowest average shown by any past immigration. I find, also, that under precisely equal conditions of birth the new immigration is inferior to the old in earning capacity.

Take, first, a study of households, where the native born of foreign father are classified by the race of the father. Among the races of the old immigration of that class the annual earnings were $569, while the annual earnings of the classes belonging to the new immigration were only $415. Then, coming to the actually foreign born, those who were born in northern and western Europe were receiving upon an average $657, while those born in eastern and southern Europe were receiving upon an average only $388; and the latter classes constitute nearly 12,000,000 of our immigration in the last 17 years. It shows that of those who were born abroad the old races are receiving almost twice as much as those of the new races.

I have, also, a table showing the proportional number of the two classes who are householders—that is, men owning homes—by which it appears that the men of the old immigration own homes to an extent twice or three times as great as that of the newer races. I ask leave to insert these tables in the record, or such portions of them as may be necessary.

EFFECT OF COMPETITION.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I now wish to call attention, while I am upon this subject, to the effect of the competition of recent immigrants upon native Americans and older immigrant employees, found in volume 1, at page 500. I give these pages in order that they may be referred to by any person who is interested in the subject:

If the foregoing characteristics of the immigrant labor supply from southern and eastern Europe be borne in mind, the effect of the influx of recent immigrants upon native American wage earners and those of older immigration from Great Britain and northern Europe may be briefly stated. The remarkable expansion in manufacturing and mining during the past 30 years, by creating a constant demand for a relatively small number of additional places for experienced and trained employees in supervisory and skilled positions, has undoubtedly led to the advancement in the scale of occupations of a relatively small proportion of native Americans and of English, Irish, Scotch, Welsh, and members of other races who constituted the wage-earning classes before the arrival of recent immigrants. On the other hand, the entrance into the operating forces of American industries of such large numbers of wage earners of the races of southern and eastern Europe—

(1) Has exposed the original employees to unsafe and insanitary working conditions and has led to or continued the imposition of conditions of employment which the Americans and older immigrants have considered unsatisfactory and in many cases unbearable.

(2) Has brought about or continued living conditions and a standard of life with which the native American and older employees have been unwilling, or have found it extremely difficult, to compete.

(3) Has led to the voluntary or involuntary displacement from certain occupations and industries of the native American and older immigrant employees.

(4) Has weakened the labor organizations of the original employees, and in some industries has led to their entire demoralization and disruption.

The existence of unsatisfactory working and living conditions because of the competition of the recent immigrant has been due to his lack of industrial training abroad, his tractability or subserviency, and his low standard of living. When the older employees have found unsafe and insanitary working conditions prevailing in the mines and industrial establishments, and have protested, the recent immigrant employees, usually through ignorance of mining or other working methods, have manifested a willingness to accept the alleged unsatisfactory conditions. The southern and eastern European employee also, because of his tractability, necessitous condition, and low standards, has been inclined, as a rule, to acquiesce in the demand upon the part of employers for extra work or longer hours. The industrial workers of recent immigration have also accepted without protest the system of so-called company stores and houses which prevails so extensively in bituminous and anthracite coal, iron-ore, and copper mining and other industrial localities. The impossibility of competition between the older employees and those with standards of living like the standards of the recent immigrants may be readily inferred from what has already been said relative to the methods of domestic economy of immigrant households and the cost of living of their members.

EFFECT ON WAGES AND HOURS OF LABOR.

I call attention also to the effect of the employment of recent immigrants upon wages and hours of work, at page 540, where the commission says:

It has not appeared in the industries covered by this investigation of manufactures and mining that it is usual for employers to engage immigrants at wages actually lower than those prevailing at the time in the industry where they are employed, whatever the ultimate tendency of the large immigration may be. It is hardly open to doubt, however, that availability of the large supply of recent immigrant labor prevented the increase in wages which otherwise would have resulted during recent years from the increased demand for labor. The low standards of the southern and eastern European, his ready acceptance of a low wage and existing working conditions, his lack of permanent interest in the occupation and community in which he has been employed, his attitude toward labor organizations, his slow progress toward assimilation, and his willingness seemingly to accept indefinitely without protest certain wages and conditions of employment, have rendered it extremely difficult for the older classes of employees to secure improvements in conditions or advancement in wages since the arrival in considerable numbers of southern and eastern European wage earners. As a general proposition it may be said that all improvement in conditions and increases in rates of pay have been secured in spite of the presence of the recent immigrants. The recent immigrant, in other words, has not actively opposed the movements toward better conditions of employment and higher wages, but his availability and his general characteristics and attitude have constituted a passive opposition which has been most effective.

LIVING CONDITIONS.

As to the living conditions of these classes, I wish to refer to the report of the commission, in volume 1, page 499, where they are summarized. The commission says:

The standards of living of the recent industrial workers from the south and east of Europe have been low, and the conditions of employment, as well as the rates of remuneration in American industry, have not as a rule constituted to them grounds for dissatisfaction. During the earlier part, at least, of their residence in the United States they have been content with living and working conditions offered to them, and it has only been after the most earnest solicitation, or sometimes even coercion, upon the part of the older employees that they have been persuaded or forced into protest.

The living conditions of southern and eastern Europeans and the members of their household is shown in the detailed studies of the various industries, the most significant indication of congestion and unsatisfactory living arrangements being the low-rent payments each month per capita. The recent immigrant males being usually single, or if married having left their wives abroad, have been able to adopt in large measure a group instead of a family living arrangement, and thereby to reduce their cost of living to a point far below that of the American or older immigrant in the same industry or the same level of occupations. The method of living usually followed is that commonly known as the "boarding-boss system." Under this arrangement a married immigrant, or his wife, or a single man, constitutes the head of the household, which, in addition to the family of the head, will usually be made up of 2 to 20 boarders or lodgers. Each lodger pays the boarding boss a fixed sum, ordinarily from $2 to $3 per month, for lodging, cooking, and washing, the food being easily bought by the boarding boss and its cost shared equally by the individual members of the group. Another common arrangement is for each member of the household to purchase his own food and have it cooked separately. Under this general method of living, however, which prevails among the greater proportion of the immigrant household, the entire outlay for necessary living expenses of each adult member ranges from $9 to $15 each month.

Think of that, Mr. President and Senators—from $9 to $15 per month! That describes the living conditions of this class of laborers in the districts to which I have referred.

The commission add:

The additional expenditures of the recent immigrant wage earners have been small. Every effort has been made to save as much as possible. The life interest and activity of the average wage earner from southern and eastern Europe has seemed to revolve principally about three points: (1) To earn the largest possible amount of immediate earnings under existing conditions of work; (2) to live upon the basis of minimum cheapness; and (3) to save as much as possible. The ordinary comforts of life as insisted upon by the average American have been subordinated to the desire to reduce the cost of living to its lowest level.

Mr. President, in view of all these circumstances, and many more to which I might allude, the commission made certain findings and certain recommendations. In volume 1, page 45, the commission say:

OPINIONS OF COMMISSION.

As a result of the investigation the commission is unanimously of the opinion that in framing legislation emphasis should be laid upon the following principles:

1. While the American people, as in the past, welcome the oppressed of other lands, care should be taken that immigration be such both in quality and quantity as not to make too difficult the process of assimilation.

2. Since the existing law and further special legislation recommended in this report deal with the physically and morally unfit, further general legislation concerning the admission of aliens should be based primarily upon economic or business considerations touching the prosperity and economic well-being of our people.

3. The measure of the rational, healthy development of a country is not the extent of its investment of capital, its outputs of products, or its exports and imports, unless there is a corresponding economic opportunity afforded to the citizen dependent upon employment for his material, mental, and moral development.

4. The development of business may be brought about by means which lower the standard of living of the wage earners. A slow expansion of industry which would permit the adaptation and assimilation of the incoming labor supply is preferable to a very rapid industrial expansion which results in the immigration of laborers of low standards and efficiency, who imperil the American standard of wages and conditions of employment.

The commission agrees that:

1. To protect the United States more effectively against the immigration of criminal and certain other debarred classes—

(a) Aliens convicted of serious crimes within a period of five years after admission should be deported in accordance with the provisions of House bill 20980, Sixty-first Congress, second session.

(b) Under the provisions of section 39 of the immigration act of February 20, 1907, the President should appoint commissioners to make arrangements with such countries as have adequate police records to supply emigrants with copies of such records, and that thereafter immigrants from such countries should be admitted to the United States only upon the production of proper certificates, showing the absence of convictions for excludable crimes.

(c) So far as practicable the immigration laws should be so amended as to be made applicable to alien seamen.

(d) Any alien who becomes a public charge within three years after his arrival in this country should be subject to deportation, in the discretion of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Vermont permit the Chair to seek some information from him?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Gladly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the State where I live we have had lately a meeting protesting against the immigration bill. Among other things, the charge was sent to me in the form of resolutions to present to the Senate, that in the investigations which the Senate Members and the House Members had made, at no time had any representatives of the foreign nations been called before them except the toilers, the laborers. The commission, it was said, had none of their intelligent people before them who could speak for them, and they seemed to attach much importance to that.

While I recognize, as a Senator from Illinois, that the matter is not now before the Senate, I should like very much to have the present Senator's views, owing to his long connection with this subject, as to whether those are facts or whether those are grievances without foundation in fact.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mr. President, the investigation to which I have been referring was conducted by trained men. The commission had a very large body of men, selected because of their intelligence and their character and their training, as investigators. We sent them out into all of these industrial communities with instructions not to overdraw nor underdraw conditions but to present them just as they were found. If anyone who is interested in the matter will look in the closing pages of volume 2 of the report, he will find copies of all of the blanks, all of the cards, all of the instrumentalities employed by the commission upon which and through which they secured the information they sought.

In the iron and steel industry the corporations aided us in distributing those cards among the heads of families and among their male workers, and such cards were received by our agents signed by the individuals. The facts so secured were compiled, and the results are found in the reports of the commission.

A really intensive study of family conditions was made by our agents, not only through the statements made by the families, but by going to the grocery stores where they traded, taking the individual accounts, and finding what the purchases were each month, of what they consisted, and the prices paid. This is only a general statement of the methods of the commission in doing that work.

When that work, which was really scientifically conducted, was completed invitations were issued to all the various representative bodies of the different races to present to the commission their views; and in these reports will be found the papers that were filed by the leaders of the leading races of immigrants in the United States. It never has been claimed to us that there was a lack of opportunity on the part of any of them to be heard.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair wishes to thank the Senator.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF COMMISSION.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Now, resuming, Mr. President, the report of the commission makes quite a good many recommendations which are not pertinent to the question I am discussing to-day, but which for the continuity of the story it may be well to have appear, and, with the permission of the Senate, I will insert them in the RECORD:

2. Sufficient appropriation should be regularly made to enforce vigorously the provisions of the laws previously recommended by the commission and enacted by Congress regarding the importation of women for immoral purposes.

3. As the new statute relative to steerage conditions took effect so recently as January 1, 1909, and as the most modern steerage fully complies with all that is demanded under the law, the commission's only recommendation in this connection is that a statute be immediately enacted providing for the placing of Government officials, both men and women, on vessels carrying third-class or steerage passengers for the enforcement of the law and the protection of the immigrant. The system inaugurated by the commission of sending investigators in the steerage in the guise of immigrants should be continued at intervals by the Bureau of Immigration.

4. To strengthen the certainty of just and humane decisions of doubtful cases at ports of entry it is recommended—

That section 25 of the immigration act of 1907 be amended to provide that boards of special inquiry should be appointed by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, and that they should be composed of men whose ability and training qualify them for the performance of judicial functions; that the provisions compelling their hearings to be separate and apart from the public should be repealed; and that the office of an additional Assistant Secretary of Commerce and Labor to assist in reviewing such appeals be created.

5. To protect the immigrant against exploitation; to discourage sending savings abroad; to encourage permanent residence and naturalization; and to secure better distribution of alien immigrants throughout the country—

(a) The States should enact laws strictly regulating immigrant banks.

(b) Proper State legislation should be enacted for the regulation of employment agencies.

(c) Since numerous aliens make it their business to keep immigrants from influences that may tend toward their assimilation and naturalization as American citizens, with the purpose of using their funds, of encouraging investment of their savings abroad, and their return to their home land, aliens who attempt to persuade immigrants not to become American citizens should be made subject to deportation.

(d) Since the distribution of the thrifty immigrant to sections of the country where he may secure a permanent residence to the best advantage, and especially where he may invest his savings in farms or engage in agricultural pursuits, is most desirable, the division of information should be so conducted as to cooperate with States desiring immigrant settlers; and information concerning the opportunities for settlement should be brought to the attention of immigrants in industrial centers who have been here for sometime and who might be thus induced to invest their savings in this country and become permanent agricultural settlers. The division might also secure and furnish to all laborers alike information showing opportunities for permanent employment in various sections of the country, together with the economic conditions in such places.

6. One of the provisions of section 2 of the act of 1907 reads as follows:

"And provided further, That skilled labor may be imported if labor of like kind unemployed can not be found in this country."

Instances occasionally arise, especially in the establishment of new industries in the United States, where labor of the kind desired, unemployed, can not be found in this country and it becomes necessary to import such labor. Under the law the Secretary of Commerce and Labor has no authority to determine the questions of the necessity for importing such labor in advance of the importation, and it is recommended that an amendment to the law be adopted by adding to the clause cited above a provision to the effect that the question of the necessity of importing such skilled labor in any particular instance may be determined by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor upon the application of any person interested prior to any action in that direction by such person; such determination by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to be reached after a full hearing and an investigation into the facts of the case.

7. The general policy adopted by Congress in 1882 of excluding Chinese laborers should be continued.

The question of Japanese and Korean immigration should be permitted to stand without further legislation so long as the present method of restriction proves to be effective.

An understanding should be reached with the British Government whereby East Indian laborers would be effectively prevented from coming to the United States.

8. The investigations of the commission show an oversupply of unskilled labor in basic industries to an extent which indicates an oversupply of unskilled labor in the industries of the country as a whole, and therefore demand legislation which will at the present time restrict the further admission of such unskilled labor.

I call attention especially to their eighth recommendation or finding. They say:

The investigations of the commission show an oversupply of unskilled labor in basic industries to an extent which indicates an oversupply of unskilled labor in the industries of the country as a whole, a condition which demands legislation restricting the further admission of such unskilled labor.

In this connection I want to say that their report was coincided in by every member of the commission; it was absolutely unanimous.

Then the commission makes the further suggestion:

It is desirable in making the restriction that—

(a) A sufficient number be debarred to produce a marked effect upon the present supply of unskilled labor.

(b) As far as possible the aliens excluded should be those who come to this country with no intention to become American citizens or even to maintain a permanent residence here, but merely to save enough, by the adoption, if necessary, of low standards of living, to return permanently to their home country. Such persons are usually men unaccompanied by wives or children.

(c) As far as possible the aliens excluded should also be those who by reason of their personal qualities or habits would least readily be assimilated or would make the least desirable citizens.

It will be observed, Mr. President, that in these suggestions the commission is not recommending exclusion of any nationality or any class excepting those who are least desirable. They are not charging that the new immigration as a whole is undesirable, but that the immigration as a whole needs reduction, and for the purpose of securing that reduction they recommend that legislation be so framed as to exclude a portion of those who are least desirable among them as a whole.

The commission adds that the following methods of restricting immigration have been suggested.

(a) The exclusion of those unable to read or write in some language.

(b) The limitation of the number of each race arriving each year to a certain percentage of the average of that race arriving during a given period of years.

(c) The exclusion of unskilled laborers unaccompanied by wives or families.

(d) The limitation of the number of immigrants arriving annually at any port.

(e) The material increase in the amount of money required to be in the possession of the immigrant at the port of arrival.

(f) The material increase of the head tax.

(g) The levy of the head tax so as to make a marked discrimination in favor of men with families.

READING TEST.

All these methods would be effective in one way or another in securing restrictions in a greater or less degree.

Then they say:

A majority of the commission favor the reading and writing test as the most feasible single method of restricting undesirable immigration.

I am betraying no secret of the commission when I say that eight out of the nine members of the commission made that recommendation. Mr. Bennett, of New York, filed a separate report under the head "Views of the minority." It may be found on page 49 of volume 1. The commission adds:

The commission as a whole recommends restriction—

In that Mr. Bennett joined—

The commission as a whole recommends restriction as demanded by economic, moral, and social considerations, furnishes in its report reasons for such restriction, and points out methods by which Congress can attain the desired result, if its judgment coincides with that of the commission.

It will be observed that the recommendation of the commission is that the reading and writing test is the most feasible single method of restricting the least desirable element in this recent immigration.

The bill does not provide for a reading and writing test, but simply provides that those over 14 years of age in order to be admitted shall be able to read in some language, not the English language necessarily, but shall be required to read in some language, a test that is perfectly reasonable, a test which it seems to me can not be considered unreasonable by any person in any foreign land who has character and stamina enough to make a good citizen of the United States if admitted. It is something which such a person can easily acquire.

But how would such a test as that operate? What classes will it reach? I have read extensively from the reports of the commission to show that it is among those employed in the basic industries that the overcrowding occurs—that it is among those classes that the living conditions are insanitary and un-American, and that almost invariably such conditions exist among the classes of immigration that come from eastern and southern Europe, and not among those from the nations of northern and western Europe.

When we come to examine the record of those who have been admitted to the United States during the last 11 years, between 1899 and 1909, during which we have received many millions of immigrants, the statistics show that the degree of illiterates of the old classes—Great Britain, Germany, the Scandinavian States, Belgium, Holland, and France—is only 2.7, while, on the other hand, the average degree of illiteracy among the new immigrants is about 35.6 per cent. So the reading test, if it operates at all, will operate almost entirely upon the classes who produce the overcrowded conditions to which I have referred, and who are found living under the conditions which are so deplorable.

So it was that the commission looked upon the reading test as the one most feasible single method of reaching the least desirable classes among the vast immigration which, in the main, is made up of strong men, of men who can be made exceedingly useful under proper conditions, but who when unemployed are not only undesirable, but a menace to good order.

In this connection I ask leave to introduce a table showing the degree of illiteracy of each of the nationalities:

Relative degree of illiteracy of the old and new immigration during period of 11 years, 1899–1909.

Over 14 years of age:
Admitted	7,199,060
Old	1,983,618
Per cent illiterate	2.7
New	5,215,442
Per cent illiterate	35.6

Percentage of illiterates of different races admitted to the United States during the 11 years, 1899–1909, inclusive.

Over 14 years of age:
Scandinavian	0.4
Scotch	0.7
English	1.1
Welsh	2.0
Irish	2.7
Dutch	4.7
German	5.4
French	5.4
Southern Italy	54.2
Polish	35.4
Hebrew	25.7
Slovak	24.6
Northern Italy	11.8
Hungarian	11.4
Croatian and Slovenian	36.4
Magars	11.4
Russian	34.7

RESTRICTION SHOULD APPLY TO THE LEAST DESIRABLE CLASSES.

Who are the least desirable individually? Among those mentioned by the commission as being least desirable are those who are least readily assimilated into American life. In this connection permit me to read briefly from volume 1, pages 38 and 39, where the commission say:

Like most of the immigration from southern and eastern Europe, those who entered the leading industries were largely single men or married men unaccompanied by their families.

That is a point which can not be too strongly emphasized. I will give figures before I have completed my remarks, indicating how largely that is true.

There is, of course, in practically all industrial communities a large number of families of the various races, but the majority of the employes are men without families here and whose standard of living is so far below that of the native American or older immigrant workman that it is impossible for the latter to successfully compete with them. They usually live in cooperative groups and crowd together. Consequently, they are able to save a great part of their earnings, much of which is sent or carried abroad. Moreover, there is a strong tendency on the part of these unaccompanied men to return to their native countries after a few years of labor here. These groups have little contact with American life, learn little of American institutions, and aside from the wages earned profit little by their stay in this country. During their early years in the United States they usually rely for assistance and advice on some member of their race, frequently a saloon keeper or grocer, and almost always a steamship ticket agent and "immigrant banker," who, because of superior intelligence and better knowledge of American ways, commands their confidence. Usually after a longer residence they become more self-reliant, but their progress toward assimilation is generally slow. Immigrant families in the industrial centers are more permanent and usually exhibit a stronger tendency toward advancement, although, in most cases, it is a long time before they even approach the ordinary standard of the American or the older immigrant families in the same grade of occupation. This description, of course, is not universally true, but it fairly represents a great part of the recent immigrant population in the United States. Their numbers are so great and the influx is so continuous that even with the remarkable expansion of industry during the past few years there has been created an oversupply of unskilled labor, and in some of the industries this is reflected in a curtailed number of working days and a consequent yearly income among the unskilled workers which is very much less than is indicated by the daily wage rates paid; and while it may not have lowered in a marked degree the American standard of living, it has introduced a lower standard which has become prevalent in the unskilled industry at large.

Again, on page 106 of volume 7, the commission say:

The south Italians are slow in becoming Americanized, and many in the coal regions who have been in this country from 15 to 20 years are scarcely able to speak English. They live in colonies, have very little association with natives, and show little interest outside of their own immediate neighborhood. They are suspicious of Americans, do not trust their money to the banks, and trade at American shops as little as possible. They are making little progress toward Americanization. Each year the south Italians are investing more money in homes and real estate, and in becoming property owners they are naturally led to take more interest in civic affairs. Even after the south Italian, however, has made his permanent home in the Southwest he seems to make little effort to adopt American ways. He does not encourage his children in attending school, but takes them away at an early age, thus preventing the second generation from having the opportunity of becoming assimilated. The children hear only Italian spoken in the colony and in the home, and their only opportunity to learn English is at school.

The Poles, Slovaks, and Magyars are almost as backward as south Italians, but are more popular with natives. They are very slow in learning to speak English and associate little with people outside of their own races. No civic interest is shown, and a very small percentage are naturalized.

* * * * * * *

Mexicans show less progress than any other immigrants. They have adopted no American ideas or customs, but live as they do in their own country. Although many of the Mexicans in the coal mines of Oklahoma were born in the United States, they are little nearer Americanization than those directly from Mexico.

I will not take the time to read more from this report, although I might do it with profit.

This great body of immigrants, concerning which I have spoken, is almost wholly made up of unskilled laborers, and are coming in such vast numbers that they are overcrowding labor at the bases of the great industries.

As evidence of this, let me call attention to the fact that of the Italians admitted, 85.4 per cent have been common or farm laborers; of the Hebrews, 32.9 per cent—they are largely classed as skilled laborers and most of them work in the clothing manufactories of the country. But coming to the Polish, one of the most numerous classes, 93.7 per cent are either common or farm laborers; of the Slovak, 95.6 per cent; of the north Italian, 79.6 per cent; of the Magyars, 91.4 per cent; of the Croatians and Slovenians, 95 per cent; of the Greeks, 92.3 per cent; of the Lithuanians, 93.3 per cent; of the Ruthenians, 79.5 per cent; of the Bulgarian, Montenegrin, and Servian, 96.7 per cent; of the Finnish, 94 per cent; of the Roumanian, 97.3 per cent; of the Portuguese, 93.7 per cent.

It thus appears that taking all these races together the percentage of that class goes considerably above 90 per cent, and yet with all the industry of the Bureau of Distribution, with all the inducements that are held out by the farmers of America, in spite of all the advantages the aliens might enjoy if they would go to the country districts, it is utterly impossible to turn any one of them away from the group with which he is admitted and of which he forms a part. All recent immigrants move in racial groups, and the group from one locality follows the group which last left that locality. So you will find one particular race largely predominating in one place and another particular race largely predominating in another, but they are all at the centers of industries.

NO INTENTION TO BECOME CITIZENS.

Another of the least desirable classes which the commission thought might well be restricted is the class who have come here without an intention to become citizens of the United States.

Senators will remember that it has always been the policy of our Government to encourage the admission of families. It is an admitted fact in our civilization that the family is the basic unit upon which good citizenship finds its best development. When a European immigrant is accompanied by his family it is evident that he has come to cast his lot with ours, to become a part of our national life, to enjoy our privileges, and to share in our responsibilities. It is the man who comes with his family who becomes a valuable asset in the American system; and it follows that if any are to be excluded it should be those who, though married, leave their wives in Europe.

I have before me a table covering those who have been in the United States more than 10 years. That I may be entirely fair in my discussion of the characteristics of the different races and nationalities, I have confined myself in this examination to those classes of immigrants who have been residents of the United States long enough so that their intentions and purposes can be clearly determined.

Of those who have become citizens of the United States, there have been of the Danish, 77.3 per cent; of the Dutch, 64.7 per cent; of the English, 67 per cent; of the French, 64.8 per cent; of the German, 81.5 per cent; of the Irish, 80 per cent; and of the Norwegian, 77.5 per cent.

Compare these percentages with those representing those classes which constitute the new immigration. Of the Polish who have resided in the United States 10 years or over, 39.8 per cent have become naturalized citizens; of the Slovaks, 25.3 per cent; of the north Italians, 49.3 per cent; of the south Italians, 34 per cent; of the Hungarians, 26.9 per cent; of the Croatians, 26.8 per cent; of the Slovenians, 35.3 per cent; and of the Russians, 33.6 per cent.

It will be seen from these figures that there are about three times as many from those nationalities constituting the old immigration who become naturalized citizens as there are from the same number of individuals among the races from eastern and southern Europe.

I have, Mr. President, another table showing the citizenship of employees who have been in the United States for different periods of time, from 5 to 10 years, and for a period of 10 years or over, which I ask leave to insert in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

CITIZENSHIP.

Citizenship of employees who have been in the United States for different periods of time (Vol. 1, pp. 485–489), page 488.

Per cent of those who have been here from 5 to 9 years having first papers only:

Old immigration:
Danish	45.6
Dutch	31.7
English	42.4
French	31.5
German	40.2
Irish	30.8
Scotch	32.1
Swedish	57.3
Welsh	46.2
Norwegian	59.0
New immigration:
Armenian	24.1
Bohemian and Moravian	46.5
Croatian	11.4
Finnish	30.1
Greek	12.8
Russian Hebrew	44.4
Other Hebrew	42.0
Italian, north	21.5
Italian, south	14.1
Lithuanian	10.3
Hungarian	15.2
Polish	11.3
Portuguese	1.6
Roumanian	10.9
Russian	11.4
Ruthenian	10.3
Servian	6.4
Slovak	8.6
Slovenian	22.6
Spanish	2.2
Syrian	10.8

Of the total number, 32,142, who had a residence here of from 5 to 9 years 6.2 per cent were fully naturalized.

The lack of political or civic interest of southern and eastern European wage earners is shown by the percentage of fully naturalized representatives of some of the principal races with a residence of 10 years or longer:

Croatian	26.8
Hebrew, Russian	48.3
Italian, north	49.3
Italian, south	34.0
Lithuanian	41.1
Magyar	26.9
Polish	39.8
Russian	33.6
Slovak	25.3

PERCENTAGE PLAN AS A MEASURE OF RESTRICTION.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Another plan suggested by the commission for restricting immigration was the limitation of the number admitted of each nationality arriving each year to a certain percentage of the average of that race resident in continental United States, including Alaska, Hawaii, and Porto Rico. At the time this report was made there was no basis upon which to submit an estimate of the operation of such a proposition if enacted into law; but the census of 1910 disclosed by nationalities the number of each in this country in that year. With that before us we are able to make an estimate at this time of how such a test as that might apply and what results would follow. Although it has not been discussed in the Senate or elsewhere, it may be of interest to call attention to the plan, and I will do so as briefly as possible.

Some time during the present Congress—I do not remember just when—I introduced an immigration bill into this body containing this proposition. That bill has not yet been considered by the Committee on Immigration, though I hope it may be; but the salient feature of the restrictive measure in that bill was this:

Provided, That the number of aliens of any nationality who may be admitted to continental United States, including Alaska, Hawaii, and Porto Rico in any fiscal year shall be limited to 10 per cent of the number of such persons of such nationality resident in continental United States, including Alaska, Hawaii, and Porto Rico at the time of the United States census next preceding; but the minimum number of aliens of any nationality admissible in any fiscal year shall not be less than 5,000.

Then follow various conditions regulating the admission of aliens under the principle of a 10 per cent basis upon the number of each of those nationalities resident here in the last preceding census year.

This proposition has caused some comment, and it may be of interest to the Senate to observe what its operation might be. I have before me a comparative statement showing the number of aliens admitted to the United States in 1913, by countries, the number who would have been admitted under the literacy test, and the number who would have been admitted under the percentage test.

Take southern and eastern Europe. The number of aliens admitted for 1913, by countries, from that section amounted to 896,533. The approximate number of this class who would have been admitted under the literacy test in 1913 is 614,082, and the approximate number who would have been admitted under the 10 per cent test, which I have suggested, is 529,553. In other words, the number admitted that year would have been decreased under the literacy test 31.5 per cent, and under the percentage test 40.9 per cent.

In the immigration coming from northern and western Europe the results would be unique. The number admitted from Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, the Netherlands, Norway, Sweden, Switzerland, and the United Kingdom was 182,886. The number of those who would have been admitted under the literacy test is 171,267, and under the percentage test 658,311. That is to say, there would have been an allowable increase in the number coming from those countries representing the races of the old immigration of 260 per cent under the percentage test. It will be remembered that, while the number coming from those nations in the last 30 years has been relatively small when compared with the number coming from eastern and southern Europe, there are so many in numbers representing the races of the old immigration resident in the United States who were admitted years ago that the percentage system would not operate to cut down the number of admissions from those countries. I will make that clear as I proceed.

As over 90 per cent of the immigrant aliens from the southern and eastern group came from the three countries, Russia, Italy, and Austria-Hungary, a comparison similar to the one above confined to these three countries is interesting:

Number admitted 1913:
Russia	291,040
Italy	265,542
Austria-Hungary	254,825
Total	811,407
Literacy test:
Russia	210,796
Italy	151,825
Austria-Hungary	197,796
Total	560,417
Decrease, 31 per cent.
Percentage test:
Russia	173,520
Italy	134,426
Austria-Hungary	167,195
Total	475,141
Decrease, 41 per cent.

Thus it will be seen, there would have been a considerable difference between the number admitted under these two tests from Russia, Italy, and Austria-Hungary. The literacy test would have cut down the immigration from these three countries from 811,408 to 560,417, or 31 per cent. The percentage test would have cut down the immigration from these three countries from 811,408 to 475,141, or 41 per cent.

It thus appears, taking the year 1913 as an illustration, that the actual immigration from each one of the countries comprising the southern and eastern Europe group would be cut down by the application of the principle in the percentage test, with the exception of that from Bulgaria, Servia, Montenegro, and Roumania, and that the cut would be greatest in the number of immigrant aliens admitted from Russia, Italy, and Austria-Hungary, which three countries furnished in 1913 over 75 per cent of the immigration to this country from all the countries in Europe, not only those in the southern and eastern group but those in the northern and western group as well. To indicate the large number of immigrants coming from these three last-mentioned countries, and how effective the 10 per cent system would prove in reducing such immigration, it may be stated that the decrease in the number of immigrants admitted from Russia and Austria-Hungary alone would be greater by 20,000 than the whole number of immigrants admitted from all the countries of the northern and western group. And yet the adoption of this system would not reduce or restrict the immigration from any country in northern or western Europe except Belgium.

To recapitulate: Basing computation upon the immigration of 1913, the literacy test would have reduced the number admitted from Austria-Hungary, Bulgaria, Servia, Montenegro, Greece, Italy, Portugal, Roumania, Russia, Spain, Turkey in Europe, and Turkey in Asia, 31.5 per cent, while the percentage test would have reduced the immigration of those countries 40.9 per cent; on the other hand, the literacy test would have reduced the number of immigrants from the northern and western group, including the United Kingdom, Germany, and Scandanavian States, France, Belgium, Switzerland, and the Netherlands only 6.4 per cent. Under the percentage test the number coming from the last-named countries might have been increased 2,304,090.

TABLE A.—A comparative statement showing the number of aliens admitted to the United States in 1913 by countries, the number who would have been admitted under the literacy test, and the number who would have been admitted under the percentage test.

[1] Decrease (literacy test), 31.5 per cent.
[2] Decrease (10 per cent system), 40.9 per cent.
[3] Decrease (literacy test), 6.35 per cent.
[4] Allowable increase (10 per cent system), 260 per cent.

So it will be seen that, under the percentage test, western and northern Europe would not be affected at all; in fact, they would be entitled to come in much larger numbers than they have done in the past; but, on the other hand, the numbers coming from eastern and southern Europe would be quite a little less than under the literacy test.

UNSKILLED WORKMEN UNACCOMPANIED BY WIVES.

The commission also suggested that the exclusion of unskilled workmen who come unaccompanied by their wives and families might be desirable, and for that reason I call particular attention to the result of my examination of the character of the immigration during the period from 1899 to 1910, inclusive.

I have already stated, Mr. President, how desirable it is that if we are to receive immigration from foreign countries it shall consist of those who come with the definite purpose to remain and who as evidence of such purpose bring their wives and children with them. To how large an extent have males predominated among the races coming from eastern and southern Europe during the 12-year period 1899–1910, inclusive?

Of those coming from south Italy, 78.6 per cent were males; of the Hebrews, 56.6 per cent; of the Polish, 69.5 per cent; of the Slovaks, 70.5 per cent; of those from north Italy, 78.3 per cent; of the Hungarians, 72.2 per cent; of the Croatians, 84.9 per cent; of the Slovenians, 70.5 per cent; of the Greeks, 95.1 per cent; and of the Lithuanians, 70.6 per cent. In this fact—that from 75 to 80 per cent of this entire immigration were males—we find a reason for the deplorable living conditions discovered by the commission, and a reason why these races do not become assimilated to American institutions.

Now, Mr. President, I call attention to what seem to me to be astounding facts, facts that ought to startle the American people and lead them to seriously consider the future of the Nation. During the last five years, 1910–1914, 2,337,557 foreign-born males, 14 years of age or over, have been admitted to the United States from southern and eastern Europe, more than 90 per cent of whom were unskilled workmen. Of this vast number 1,234,531, or 52.9 per cent, were single men and 1,102,631, or 47.1 per cent, were married men.

But the startling fact appears that of this vast body of married men, 39 per cent had left their wives abroad, and we are compelled to recognize the fact that 70.1 per cent of all the males over 14 years of age coming in the last five years and numbering 2,337,557 are leading single lives. These facts will more fully appear from the following table:

TABLE B.—Table showing the number of males, 14 years of age or over, coming to the United States in the last 5 years, 1910–1914, from southern and eastern Europe, by countries, the number of single men, the number of married men, and the number who were widowed or divorced.

Single, widowed, or divorced, 1,234,531, or 52.9 per cent.
Married, 1,102,631, or 47.1 per cent.

Applying the percentages of the married men who reported leaving their wives abroad, by races, as found by the commission's study of the immigrants in mining and manufacturing, to the actual number of married men over 14 years of age coming to the Untied States during the last five years, it will appear that 431,553 of the whole number, 1,102,631, should really be classed with those leading single lives, 39 per cent of them as appears in the following table:

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Certainly.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Does that mean that these men had deserted their families?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Not necessarily; no. Many of them returned.

Mr. CRAWFORD. They were maintaining their homes on the other side of the water?

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Undoubtedly; and many of them returned. But what is the condition in this country where there has been an influx of such a vast number of unskilled male laborers, 70 per cent of whom are leading single lives and living under the boarding-boss system, with perhaps 20 in a family? Of course these people who have failed to bring their families have no children in our public schools. The common schools, the great agency in this country for bringing the newcomers in contact with the old, can not serve their purpose as an assimilating agency under such conditions. These people live in parts of cities hardly ever invaded by the old residents. What does this mean? It means that this vast body of people are living, as I have indicated, under conditions which are undesirable, with no interest in the municipality where they reside, no pride in the State where they find their employment, and, as a rule, knowing very little of and having no interest in the General Government of which we are so proud and so fond.

I have in this connection, Mr. President, a table showing the percentage of those who, being married men, reported to the commission that they had left their wives in Europe, which I ask may be inserted in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

Mr. DILLINGHAM. Mark the difference between the nationalities which constitute the old and the new immigration.

APPLICATION OF THE READING TEST.

Mr. President, the reading test, to which I have referred, will apply substantially as follows: I will take the immigration of the last 11 years as a basis for the discussion.

During that time we admitted substantially 7,000,000 aliens. Of the old immigration 2.7 per cent would have been excluded, and of the new immigration, amounting to 5,215,000, 35.6 per cent would have been excluded.

Let me say also that in comparison with other means of restriction the literacy test is essentially humane to the immigrating classes of Europe. It is so simple and direct that the right of a person to admission into the United States can be determined in advance, and it will not subject individual immigrants to that uncertainty and loss which would attend a less definite method of restriction.

I venture, also, to suggest that the requirement that one be able to read in some language is not unreasonable. The ability to read in one's own language is not a difficult acquirement, particularly in the case of a person who in point of intelligence or character will make a desirable citizen, and the effort that might be required is not too high a price to pay for the benefits which will accrue to the individual in securing for himself the American standard of living and wages. Not only that, but the application of this test will prove a benefit to the countries from which they come, because it will stimulate elementary education among the masses.

Mr. President, in closing my remarks I wish to call attention to what seems to me to be a most remarkable condition in this country, disclosed by the last census, and one which must not be overlooked. It indicates a danger to which we should not close our eyes—one of which the President could have had no knowledge when preparing his veto message.

It is a startling fact that in the census year 1900 there were found within our borders 900,000 foreign-born male whites, 21 years of age or over, who had taken no steps to become citizens of the United States, but who, under our naturalization laws, were entitled to do so at once.

The census of 1910 discloses the alarming fact that in a single decade the number of foreign-born males who were over 21 years of age and who had then taken no steps to become citizens of the United States had increased from 900,000 to 2,260,000.

What does this vast increase signify? What does the presence in the United States of 2,260,000 male whites of foreign birth of more than 21 years of age portend?

While it is not probable that such results will follow, it is possible for this entire body to become naturalized citizens of the United States within a period of five years. Should that be done, who can measure the influence of the addition of this vast number of voters upon the policies and the progress of our Nation?

Do you realize that 2,260,000 men represent a number equal to one-seventh of the entire vote cast in the United States in the presidential election of 1912?

The possibilities suggested by the presence in this country of this vast number of prospective voters can be better understood when I call attention to the fact that the entire presidential vote of California, Oregon, Washington, Montana, Idaho, Wyoming, Nevada, Utah, Colorado, Arizona, New Mexico, North Dakota, South Dakota, Nebraska, and Kansas in the election of 1912 amounted only to about 2,280,000, while this body of prospective citizens in the United States in 1910 numbered 2,260,000. Further comment is unnecessary.

Mr. President, I am strongly impressed with the conviction that the time has come when the policy of restricting immigration by means of a literacy test should be inaugurated. It is a policy that was demanded as early as 1896 by both political parties of the Nation. It is a policy which has been approved by affirmative legislation by three separate Congresses of the United States, chosen by the people of the Nation at three several elections, and this is conclusive evidence that the subject is one which has met the "conscious and universal assent of the American people."

And yet the President of the United States says:

> Let the platforms of the parties speak out on this policy, and the people pronounce their wish. The matter is too fundamental to be settled otherwise.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. STONE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 15 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, February 13, 1915, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 12, 1915.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou great Spirit, Father of all souls, the inspiration of every great thought, earnest conviction, and worthy endeavor, we are reminded to-day of a great soul whom Thou didst call to bear the burdens of the Nation in the hour of its greatest peril; who listened, heard, obeyed, and left in his wake a character so pure, so noble, so true, so brave. His deeds live and will live so long as men cherish life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. It is well for us to perpetuate his memory in bronze and granite, but let us hold his memory sacred to our hearts, live the principles he enunciated, follow his illustrious example, and be willing, faithful servants in the tasks Thou hast set for us, "that government of the people, by the people, for the people shall not perish from the earth." And Thine be the praise forever in Christ Jesus our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Missouri rise?

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, this is the anniversary of the birthday of Abraham Lincoln. I ask unanimous consent to have read at the Clerk's desk his now renowned address delivered at Gettysburg in 1863.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to have read from the Clerk's desk the Gettysburg address of Abraham Lincoln. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair appoints the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] to read it.

Mr. RUSSELL, from the Clerk's desk, read Lincoln's Gettysburg Address, delivered at the dedication of the cemetery at Gettysburg, November 19, 1863, as follows:

"Four score and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent a new Nation, conceived in liberty and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal.

"Now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that Nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated, can long endure. We are met on a great battle field of that war. We have come to dedicate a portion of that field as a final resting place for those who here gave their lives that that Nation might live. It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this.

"But, in a larger sense, we can not dedicate, we can not consecrate, we can not hallow this ground. The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here have consecrated it far above our poor power to add or detract. The world will little note nor long remember what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us, the living, rather to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us—that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion; that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain; that this Nation under God shall have a new birth of freedom; and that government of the people, by the people, for the people shall not perish from the earth."

The SPEAKER. Under a special order of the House the gentleman from New York [Mr. GOULDEN] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. GOULDEN. Mr. Speaker, last year on this day it was my privilege to make a few brief remarks regarding Lincoln's famous speech at Gettysburg. On the occasion when it was delivered, the dedication of the battle field as a national cemetery, it was my good fortune to be present and hear the address from its author's lips. I remember the impressive ceremonies of that solemn day and the long and eloquent tribute of Edward Everett, which has been forgotten.

Many times since that memorable day I have been asked regarding President Lincoln's appearance and manner, how he contrasted with the others present, how his speech seemed to impress his hearers, and the difference in effect between the President's speech and that of Mr. Everett.

The day was so impressive in itself and after events so fixed it in my mind that its central facts are still as clear and vivid as though it were yesterday. When the President came forward, after the finished oration of Mr. Everett, he looked tired and seemed nervous. Hearty applause greeted him as he stepped to the front of the platform.

With his right arm extended and with a smile that illumined his rugged face, giving it a charm that only those who actually saw it could understand or appreciate, he began his speech in clear distinct tones that carried to quite a distance. At first his voice trembled slightly, but speedily recovered, and amid a profound silence his audience heard the words that were uttered by President Lincoln.

It seemed that he had but started speaking when, with both arms extended as if in benediction, he finished and retired without a change in his solemn countenance. No one realized that he had finished, evidently expecting a much longer effort; and the awe-struck people, apparently deeply moved, gave no sign of approval or appreciation. That was the way it appealed to those around me and to myself.

The profound silence which attended the speech continued; not a sound was heard for a minute or two; then everyone began turning to his neighbors, looking into their faces, and making such comments as "Did he finish?" "Was it not a grand speech, but so short!"

Though Everett, Seward, and others on the platform shook Mr. Lincoln's hand, he quickly took his seat, evidently sorely disappointed that the people had given no sign of any kind as to the effect of the speech.

It was my good fortune to see the President again on several occasions, notably at City Point early in 1865, where he had gone to be in close touch with the Army leaders, then relentlessly closing in on Lee. The soldiers and sailors of the Army and Navy who were at City Point in large numbers idolized the President, and warmly and affectionately greeted him wherever he appeared. He was their hero.

On July 11, 1864, at Fort Stevens, in the District of Columbia, our improvised forces, many drawn from the clerks in the departments and the workingmen from the navy yard, had been hastily assembled to repel Early's threatened attack on Washington. President Lincoln was under fire from the enemy's guns on that day. He exposed himself by standing on the earthworks of the fort to study the field in front of our line, notwithstanding the earnest protests of Gen. McCook, the commanding officer. He slowly descended from his dangerous position the coolest of anyone in the fort. Being in the service at the time with a battery at the Shoemaker place, quite near Fort Stevens, I saw President Lincoln enter and leave our front, and while not an eyewitness to the scene, I had it direct from several who had seen the incident, and therefore I have no doubt of its being true.

Alexander H. Coffroth, of Somerset County, Pa., a Member of this House in the Thirty-eighth and Thirty-ninth Congresses, although a Democrat in politics, was one of Mr. Lincoln's warm personal friends and, like him, a capital story teller. Through mutual friends, although I was but a youngster, I grew to know Mr. Coffroth quite well, and from his lips heard many characteristic stories of the President's big heartedness and of his humane actions.

One was that on going to the White House one day he saw two poorly dressed women, each with a baby in her arms, sitting near by and crying. Mr. Coffroth stopped and soon learned their sad plight. They were the wives of coal miners in Pennsylvania, and their husbands, recently arrived from abroad, had been drafted and sent to Washington for service in the Army of the Potomac.

The Congressman bade them wait until he returned. He at once talked to Mr. Lincoln about them, telling the whole story. The latter sent for the women, and after listening to them gave an order for the discharge of the husbands, giving it to an orderly, who, under the President's instructions, saw it carried out; and the reunited families returned home the same day.

The widow of the brave and heroic Gen. Pickett, who led the famous charge at Gettysburg on July 3, 1863, told me personally quite recently of the visit of President Lincoln to her home in Richmond the day following the evacuation of the Confederate capital, and of his great kindness. It was through Mr. Lincoln that Gen. Pickett was sent to West Point and given a place in Washington soon after the war closed.

These personal touches and impressions have endeared to me the memory of the martyred President; but I have always had a profound respect and admiration for many other things in his life and character which seemed to bind all to him personally. He was a wonderful combination of sadness and cheerfulness, of strong, steady character and moods of frivolity, and was a constant fascination and puzzle even to his intimates.

I believe this combination of sadness and cheerfulness was a natural balancing of his character, and to accentuate either one or the other is to distort the picture; to lay too much stress on Lincoln the story teller is to forget the great statesman; he relieved the profound weight of great responsibility by the delight he took in a good story, and by the clever way he used it to "point a moral" or drive home a needed lesson.

In discussing his story-telling habit with the late Senator Chauncey M. Depew he said that the common people, whom he knew and understood, were more easily influenced and informed through a broad illustration than in any other way, and he did not care what the hypercritical few thought. He also said that he had invented but two stories in his life, but that he could tell tolerably well the stories of other people.

His taste in verse ran usually in the opposite course, and he loved to recite and to sing sad and sentimental poems and patriotic songs. Among his favorites were Byron's Dream; Ben Bolt; Lament of the Irish Emigrant; I've Wandered to the Village, Tom; and Sword of Bunker Hill. He was even known on one or two occasions to compose a few verses himself, usually upon some sad occasion, such as the death of a boyhood friend. On the afternoon of the day Lee surrendered, while the President's boat was steaming up the Potomac, one of the passages from Shakspeare which he read aloud to his companions was that from Macbeth, following the death of Duncan.

But the poem which he oftenest recited and which seems to have been his greatest favorite and had become immortalized as such was the very long one by William Knox, beginning:

Oh! why should the spirit of mortal be proud?
Like a swift-fleeting meteor, a fast-flying cloud,
A flash of the lightning, a break of the wave,
He passeth from life to his rest in the grave.

The leaves of the oak and the willow shall fade,
Be scattered around, and together be laid;
And the young and the old, and the low and the high,
Shall moulder to dust, and together shall lie.

Years later I heard some lines which I believe Mr. Lincoln would have keenly appreciated, but which he never seems to have known. They are so appropriate to the man, so much of an epitome of his life and spirit, that I can not do better than quote them as a fitting close to this brief account of my personal recollections of the great man as well as for your thought:

Fathers, have ye bled in vain,
Ages, must ye droop again,
Maker, shall we rashly stain,
Blessings sent by Thee?

No! receive our solemn vow,
As before Thy throne we bow
Ever to maintain as now,
Union! Liberty!

[Applause.]

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for eight minutes to talk on Abraham Lincoln.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for 10 minutes to talk on Abraham Lincoln. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, we all concede that nothing new can be said of Abraham Lincoln—neither as a man nor as a President. History and biography have been busy with his name and fame for more than half a century, and history has said its last word. It was that crash of cannon shot against the walls of Fort Sumter which started the movement that made the name of Abraham Lincoln the most sacred heritage of a redeemed Nation. Without the titanic conflict that followed the name and fame of Abraham Lincoln might never have inspired a national lyric.

It is not great men who make great epochs of history. It is great epochs that make great men. Had there been no Trojan war there would have been no Homer. Had there been no conflict of the kings in the formative period of English literature there would have been no Shakespeare. Had there been no war of the American Revolution there would have been no George Washington, and had there been no Civil War in 1861 there would have been no Abraham Lincoln.

The American people were leading a dull and melancholy life before that awful struggle of arms, but with that crash of cannon shot against the walls of Sumter came a new and inspired life. When the storm burst the finger of God dropped the plummet into the dead sea, and with the overflow came new hopes, new ambitions, and new inspirations. And throughout that four years' struggle, the most desperate and long continued of modern wars, the leading hand, the guiding spirit in the camps and courts and capitals of the Nation was Abraham Lincoln, the President and Commander in Chief.

On election day in November, 1864, I was with a veteran army, marching to battle; to the desperate death grapple at Franklin, Tenn. That morning early, before the start, I rode back to the ambulance corps and obtained an ambulance, and at every halt in that dreary November day of forced marching the soldiers of my regiment voted in an old camp kettle for President; and we counted the votes at night by the dim light of the bivouac fires—only seven votes against Abraham Lincoln in the whole regiment.

Only once did I ever meet Abraham Lincoln. That was on the 4th day of March, 1865, when I was clothed in the grim harness of war, with my once blue uniform tarnished in grime from the red clay roads of northern Georgia. Then I stood within 10 feet of him on the east front of the Capitol and heard him deliver his last inaugural—his last oration on earth. I heard him say:

Fondly do we hope, fervently do we pray, that this mighty scourge of war may speedily pass away. With malice toward none, with charity for all, with firmness in the right, as God gives us to see the right, let us strive to finish the work we are in, to bind up the Nation's wounds, to care for him who shall have borne the battle and for his widow and his orphan.

We have made a half century of history since that eventful day, but I can see Lincoln now as I saw him then—a tall, gaunt, stalwart man, with deep lines of care furrowing his checks, with inexpressible sadness in his face, the face of a man of many sorrows. A sad face, a strong face, a face radiant with the inspiration of a great soul, as he voiced in prophecy the ultimate destiny of this Nation. As a soldier of the Republic I heard Abraham Lincoln voice his national ideals in his last message to the American people.

Two million soldiers fought under Abraham Lincoln, the revered President and Commander in Chief, in the most desperate and longest enduring war of modern times. Over and above the 2,000,000 soldier graves that are, or soon will be, there rises triumphant in the radiant glory of a world-wide beneficence the prescient prophet of emancipation, the leader in the grandest epoch-making era of all civilization—Abraham Lincoln. [Loud applause.]

PENSIONS.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, to-day, under the rules of the House, is set apart for the consideration of pension bills on the Private Calendar. There are no House bills upon the calendar, but there are three bills from the Senate upon that calendar. There is pending at this time and being considered in the House an important appropriation bill with which the chairman of that committee desires to proceed. Desiring to accommodate ourselves to the Appropriations Committee and the other leaders of the House, our committee desires to yield to-day, with the understanding that the committee will be recognized next Monday, in order to pass these bills under suspension of the rules.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to be recognized for the purpose of asking unanimous consent that a special report of the Interior Department upon the bill pending before the Indian Committee of the House relative to the Seneca Indians in New York——

The SPEAKER. Well, we will attend to this other matter first. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Missouri, to suspend the rules, and pass these pension bills.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will there be any trouble about these bills?

Mr. MANN. Let us see if there will be any opposition.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimcus consent, so as to find out, that these pension bills may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union now.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman can withdraw the request if there is opposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that these Senate pension bills be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report the first bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. 6980) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The bill was read.

During the reading of the bill,

The Clerk read as follows:

The name of Catharine Terwilger, widow of John W. Terwilger, late of Company F, One hundred and fifty-sixth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, and pay her a pension at the rate of $20 per month in lieu of that she is now receiving.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. PLATT. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if this Catharine Terwilger bill is the one introduced by Senator ROOT. If it is, she is dead.

Mr. RUSSELL. Is it one introduced by Senator ROOT?

Mr. PLATT. Yes.

Mr. RUSSELL. I do not know. There is nothing in the report to show who introduced the bill originally. If the gentleman knows she is dead I will be glad to have him suggest an amendment.

Mr. PLATT. It will not do any harm, but I think the woman is dead. It is a bill of mine which I got Senator ROOT to introduce.

The following committee amendments were read:

SENECA AND OTHER INDIANS OF THE FIVE NATIONS, NEW YORK (H. DOC. NO. 1590).

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to renew my request for unanimous consent.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, there are two other bills.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that; but the gentleman from Texas has something he wants to get done by unanimous consent.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I ask unanimous consent to have a report from the Department of the Interior, and also one from the Department of Justice, on a bill to settle the affairs of the Seneca and other Indians in the Five Nations, of New York, printed as a House document.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] asks unanimous consent to have printed as a House document certain Senate and House reports on the Seneca Indians. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. These reports are made to whom?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. These reports are made to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is apparent that they can not be taken up at this session, but they are very fine reports.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PENSIONS.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next one of these Senate pension bills.

The Clerk read the following bill:

A bill (S. 7213) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read the bill, with the following committee amendments, which were agreed to:

On page 1, strike out lines 6 to 9, inclusive.
On page 3, strike out lines 1 to 4, inclusive.
On page 3, strike out lines 5 to 8, inclusive.
On page 4, strike out lines 15 to 18, inclusive.
On page 5, strike out lines 15 to 18, inclusive.
On page 9, strike out lines 3 to 5, inclusive.
On page 11, line 21, strike out "$30" and insert in lieu thereof "$24."

Mr. DIES rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Texas rise?

Mr. DIES. I rise for the purpose of striking out a word or two, with a view to getting information on the bill or making a pro forma amendment for the purpose of asking the gentleman in charge of the bill a question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. DIES. I wanted to ask the chairman of the Committee on Pensions if it is to be the policy of that committee to continue bringing in these private pension bills in the event of an extra session? That is to say, if we have an extra session, are we to have a continuation of the private pension bills?

Mr. SHERWOOD. In answer to the gentleman's question, Mr. Speaker, I will say that it would depend upon the action of the committee. We did not do it at the last extra session. I may say, on the part of the chairman, that it is not the intention to bring in private pension bills in case there should be an extra session.

Mr. DIES. The gentleman understands that the majority of the House is strongly opposed to an extra session, and that may have an influence on the disposition of the committee.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted, I do not think any pension bills have been brought in at an extra session. That has been the policy at extra sessions.

Mr. DIES. I just wanted to get that information.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read the remainder of the bill, with the following committee amendments, which were agreed to:

On page 13, strike out lines 11 to 14, inclusive.
On page 14, strike out lines 1 to 4, inclusive.
On page 17, strike out lines 20 to 23, inclusive.
On page 19, line 15, strike out "$40" and insert in lieu thereof "$36."
On page 24, line 14, strike out "$36" and insert in lieu thereof "$30."
On page 25, line 15, strike out "$20" and insert in lieu thereof "$24."
On page 26, line 9, strike out "$30" and insert in lieu thereof "$40."
On page 27, strike out lines 7 to 10, inclusive.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RUSSELL. The next bill is S. 7402.

The Clerk read the bill (S. 7402), granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

The following committee amendments were read, considered, and agreed to:

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. RUSSELL, a motion to reconsider the votes by which the several bills were passed was laid on the table.

GEORGE WASHINGTON GLICK.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate concurrent resolution 28, accepting the statue of George Washington Glick, presented by the State of Kansas, and tendering thanks of Congress therefor.

I will state that by an oversight the Senate concurrent resolution had not reached the House at the time of the ceremonies incidental to receiving the statue which had been placed in Statuary Hall.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which he sends to the Clerk's desk.

The concurrent resolution was read, as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution 28.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the statue of George Washington Glick, presented by the State of Kansas to be placed in Statuary Hall, is accepted in the name of the United States, and that the thanks of Congress be tendered the State for the contribution of the statue of one of its most eminent citizens, illustrious for his distinguished civic services.

Second. That a copy of these resolutions, suitably engrossed and duly authenticated, be transmitted to the governor of the State of Kansas.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 21318, the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 21318, the sundry civil appropriation bill, with Mr. CRISP in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF MINES.

For general expenses, including pay of the director and necessary assistants, clerks, and other employees in the office at Washington, D. C., and in the field, and every other expense requisite for and incident to the general work of the bureau in Washington, D. C., and in the field, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, $70,000.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Within a few days I have received a letter from a gentleman who is an officer of a gas company, in which he says:

I inclose a postal I received this morning showing how the United States Government is spending the money of the public for the benefit of some technical people. I have no sympathy with that kind of thing.

The card which he inclosed was addressed to him.

Mr. BARTLETT. What kind of people did he say?

Mr. GILLETT. Technical people. The card which he inclosed was addressed to him from the Department of the Interior, Bureau of Mines. That card reads as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, BUREAU OF MINES.

PUBLICATIONS ON THE TECHNOLOGY OF OIL AND NATURAL GAS, JANUARY, 1915.

Technical Paper 32: The cementing process of excluding water from oil wells, as practiced in California, by Ralph Arnold and V. R. Garfias. 1913. 12 pp., 1 fig.

Technical Paper 37: Heavy oil as fuel for internal-combustion engines, by I. C. Allen. 1913. 36 pp.

Technical Paper 38: Wastes in the production and utilization of natural gas, and methods for their prevention, by Ralph Arnold and F. G. Clapp. 1913. 29 pp.

Technical Paper 42: The prevention of waste of oil and gas from flowing wells in California, with a discussion of special methods used by J. A. Pollard, by Ralph Arnold and V. R. Garfias. 1913. 15 pp., 2 pls., 4 figs.

Technical Paper 66: Mud-laden fluid applied to well drilling, by J. A. Pollard and A. G. Heggem. 1914. 21 pp, 12 figs.

Technical Paper 68: Drilling wells in Oklahoma by the mud-laden fluid method, by A. G. Heggem and J. A. Pollard. 1914. 27 pp., 5 figs.

Technical Paper 72. Problems of the petroleum industry; results of conferences at Pittsburgh, Pa., August 1 and September 10, 1913, by I. C. Allen. 1914. 20 pp.

Technical Paper 79: Electric lights for oil and gas wells, by H. H. Clark. 1914. 8 pp.

NOTE.—Only a limited supply of these publications is available for free distribution, and applicants are asked to cooperate in insuring an equitable distribution by selecting publications that are of especial interest. Requests for all papers can not be granted without satisfactory reason. Publications should be ordered by number and title. Applications should be addressed to the Director of the Bureau of Mines, Washington, D. C.

I suppose this is merely a specimen of the activity of the Bureau of Mines in advertising their wares and publications throughout the country to persons whom they think they might interest. Obviously they have a force of clerks who must be engaged in finding out the names of officials in different parts of the country engaged in business affected more or less remotely, and then they send out to them these cards, and then, I suppose, often replies come asking for the free bulletins, and then they come to us and tell us of the great demand there is for their papers and the great good they are doing to the public.

I suppose very few of those who receive them have the thoughtfulness of my correspondent, to consider that the money of the public is being wasted in this way or to write to their Congressmen objecting.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does the gentleman know that in all the departments of the Government they endeavor to extend to the limit all their publications?

Mr. GILLETT. I do not know it, though I had suspected it. I did not know that that was being done by the Bureau of Mines. It does not seem to me that it is a proper expenditure under their appropriation.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is the gentleman aware that there are a great many wells from which natural gas is escaping and that the by-product of gasoline can be manufactured from the natural gas and that these very papers to which the gentleman refers are technical papers that will enable the owners of the gas wells to furnish one of the best by-products that can be obtained?

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that that knowledge is primarily obtained by the Bureau of Mines. The companies that are engaged in such business throughout the country are the ones specially interested, and they do not need the Bureau of Mines to tell them what to do. There are scientific papers published in the country which publish discussions and the self-interest of these companies, who are all the time experimenting, do not need the Bureau of Mines to issue technical papers to direct them how they shall carry on their business.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. GILLETT. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. If this bureau has discovered how to make a by-product from natural gas, which is now being wasted from the majority of wells in the United States; if it has discovered a method of manufacturing a by-product that is used universally as gasoline is, does not the gentleman think that that technical knowledge should be disseminated?

Mr. GILLETT. The gentleman says they make gasoline from natural gas?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. They do. Does not the gentleman think that this valuable information should be disseminated by publications?

Mr. GILLETT. No; I do not believe that that is a Government function. If there is some such discovery, I do not believe it was made by the Bureau of Mines. Such discoveries are made by persons in the business. I do not think there is any danger that such a great discovery will not be disseminated by scientific papers and scientific men throughout the country—I do not think it is necessary for the United States to go into the business of circulating this information to persons whom they suspect may be interested. They are being sent now to New England—this long card about oil wells. It is a waste of time and a waste of money. Of course occasionally a correspondent may send back his protest, but what most men will do is to say, "Here are papers I can get for nothing, and I will send on and get them." And most of them will go into the waste basket. I do not think it is necessary for the Bureau of Mines to be disseminating knowledge of this sort, because I believe there are journals that will do it, and I believe that the self-interest of corporations is going to keep them in touch and abreast of the discoveries.

I do not think it is right for them to in this way try to work up a circulation and then come to us and tell us what great circulation they have and how popular their publications are.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. If we stop paying for this kind of work, will not the occupation of some of these scientific gentlemen be gone?

Mr. GILLETT. That is doubtless true, and it works both ways.

Mr. BARTLETT. A great many of these scientific investigations are inaugurated by these scientific gentlemen in order for them to keep their positions.

Mr. GILLETT. I think that is true; it employs a lot of men in issuing elementary pamphlets giving facts which might be found elsewhere, and it discourages the natural organs, the newspapers and scientific papers, because they must compete with this voluntary gratuitous service, so that it seems both a waste and an abuse.

I did not know that this was being done by this bureau. This card came to me, and I thought I would call the attention of the House to it. May I ask the chairman of the committee if he knows under what appropriation these clerks are employed to find out what men throughout the country would be available as receivers of such information and how these men who write the pamphlets are paid?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They have editorial assistance, and it is provided for under this particular item.

Mr. GILLETT. Page 98, line 13?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They have two editorial assistants and various kinds of clerks.

Mr. GILLETT. I presume that is the section. But it seems to me there is a great waste of efficiency here. There is probably a very small percentage of their distributions and output which reaches persons who are really improved by it, and I think those who need it would find it in some other way.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This bureau requested additional money for clerk hire and other service. The committee was convinced that the bureau was provided with sufficient clerical force; that if the service were devoted to the collating of information and making it available to those who are really interested and to whom the information would be desirable they would secure it without having it forced upon them like unwilling patients taking drugs, and the bureau would do the work much better than it does.

Nearly every service of the Government is afflicted with one malady, and that is an overpowering desire to be exploited in the public press and to magnify the importance of its work, to compel the people to read their publications, regardless of the particular value of the publications to particular classes of people. A few years ago it was ascertained that the bureaus in some of the departments of the Government maintained press bureaus, publicity bureaus, the chief purpose being to stimulate public interest so as to coerce Congress into appropriating money in larger sums than, in the good judgment of Members of Congress, were needed for the proper conduct of the public service.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Is that practice entirely discontinued now?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is not entirely discontinued; and it is by the bringing to light of such matters as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] calls to the attention of the House that something can be done to impress upon the executive officials of the Government that Congress has always been hostile to the so-called business of publicity methods that may be appropriate commercial enterprises but which is inconsistent in the conduct of the public service.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. HULINGS. On page 97 there is an appropriation of $135,000 for the investigation of mineral fuels, and so forth.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We have not yet reached that.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, there is no question but that the departments of the Government are at times subject to criticism on account of their self-exploiting methods. As just stated, it has been found necessary in times past to somewhat limit the activity of some of these enterprising gentlemen in spending the public money for purposes that bordered on self-advertisement; but I do not believe that the Bureau of Mines is properly subject to criticism in its methods of furnishing information to the public. I do not believe that it is subject to criticism at all in the case before us. We have an appropriation carried in this bill for inquiries and investigations concerning the mining, preparation, treatment, and utilization of petroleum and natural gas, with a view to the economic development and conserving of the resources through the prevention of waste, a very wise appropriation, in my judgment. There has been in this country a very sinful waste of our resources in gas and oil, and while it is true that it is not the duty of the Federal Government or the province of the Federal Government alone to prevent that waste, to overcome it, to discourage it, Congress has believed, and wisely, that it is proper for us to use the agencies of the Federal Government in a legitimate way for the purpose of disseminating among the people information, first, as to the facts of these great losses, and, second, as to the methods of their prevention. Each one of the bulletins referred to has to do with the conservation of our oil and gas resources. I happen to know something about each one of these bulletins. I believe they are each and every one of them valuable and useful.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, has the gentleman read them?

Mr. MONDELL. I will not say that I have read them all through carefully, but I have read some of them, and I have glanced through them all, so that I know in a general way their contents.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I hold in my hand technical paper No. 57 issued by this Bureau of Mines on the suitability of natural gas for making gasoline, by George A. Burrill, something I stated a few moments ago, which was disputed by several gentlemen on the floor.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I want to refer to that a little later, if I have the time. If it is proper that we should inquire into this waste and inquire into the methods of prevention, it is highly important, it seems to me, that we should have the widest possible dissemination and distribution of this information, and in these busy days, when men engaged in industries do not have time to read everything in the newspapers and keep thoroughly abreast with everything that is going on, it is frequently necessary to challenge their attention in regard to matters that are of vital interest to them in regard to matters that they are very glad to know about but which might entirely escape them if their attention was not challenged in that way. What the Bureau of Mines does is to get the addresses of people whom they believe to be interested in these matters and notify them on a postal card of these publications and of how they may be obtained. Many of them are sold, so that, as a matter of fact, the Government does not lose the entire cost of publication.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. And if we are going to make these investigations, if it is proper that we should, it is highly important that the public should be informed with regard to what is being done. So much for that.

There is, however, a criticism to be made, a legitimate criticism, of almost every Government bureau under the flag, a criticism that, I regret very much to say, applies somewhat, though not in the same degree that it does to others, to our good friends of the Bureau of Mines. Congress does not contemplate, and none of us believes, that it is possible for the agents of the Federal Government to go into these technical questions as to the utilization of products as thoroughly as individuals or corporations owning and interested in them do and will do, and we do not ordinarily expect these agencies to make startling discoveries with regard to the utilization of these products. It is true that they will here and there make a discovery that is important and valuable and useful—they have done so—but there is a temptation to find out what other people are doing, and then, through a peculiar mental process, come to the conclusion that the department agents have discovered the process. Take, for instance, this process of the manufacture of gasoline from gas. I presume it is true that the agents of the department have illuminated that subject somewhat. They may have made some valuable discoveries, but hundreds of thousands of dollars have been expended by private parties in successfully working out those processes. There are very considerable industries in the country to-day manufacturing gasoline from gas.

Take the other phase of the question, the manufacture of motor spirits, which is a substitute for gasoline and sometimes sold as gasoline, from the heavy product of petroleum. Formerly we took from the petroleum only the amount of gasoline that could be secured by ordinary processes of distillation. But the demand for gasoline and motor spirits became so great that there was not a sufficient amount of gasoline obtainable in that natural way from the oils of the country. Then began investigations of the possibility of securing motor spirits or gasoline from the heavy oils. I am told that one corporation of this country spent in the neighborhood of a million dollars before they worked out a successful process of manufacturing motor spirits from the heavy oil. Two years ago there was erected in my State a very large and very expensive refinery, which is taking the heavy oil which was largely valueless and manufacturing motor spirits from it. Now, I do not think the Bureau of Mines have as yet claimed to be the discoverers of that method, but my recollection is that there has been some suggestion in some of their publications that might lead one to believe that they had been largely instrumental in that very valuable and useful work. These gentlemen do not need to claim discoveries made by others, either directly or by suggestion, because they justify their employment in reporting the experience of others, in finding what the best practice is in the country, and then informing the people the country over in reference to it. There is a temptation on the part of the bureaus in sending out information which is useful and legitimate to make at least as much of a claim of originality in the matter as the facts will warrant. Of course there is a certain amount of original research being done by the department, and many new methods are developed and given to the world, but the work of the bureaus, to a large extent, is to make available facts already known by somebody.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, there seems to be some criticism of the distribution of these circulars of information; in this particular case those issued by the Bureau of Mines. I have always believed that there was a latent danger that must be guarded against in all bureaus and departments of the Government in seeking a sort of advertising propaganda, or self-exploitation, and yet that danger is so natural and so inherent that it must be reckoned with as an incident of any activity of that kind in which the Government engages. The fact that such latent danger exists does not discount the value of the activities to the public. I do believe, on the other hand, that as this scientific information is gathered by the scientific experts, paid for by the Federal Treasury, the only possible value of those investigations and those compilations of scientific data and statistics is to get them into the hands of the people who are interested in that particular industry. If we allow that information, after it is gathered, to accumulate in the vaults in Washington because we feared that some expense will be incurred in printing and putting it before the people, we are saving at the wrong end. We are destroying the value of what has taken a good deal of money, time, and labor to create. In other words, the only value of this information from any governmental aspect is to put it into the hands of the people, and primarily into the hands of those whose business and activities make a demand for that kind of information. So that it strikes me it is perfectly legitimate to get it before the people, provided, of course, that it is valuable and accurate to a reasonable extent—not accurate in extent beyond criticism, but to a reasonably accurate extent.

Now, it is perfectly true, as the gentleman from Wyoming has said, that private enterprise, private initiative, can be depended upon to exploit almost any source of wealth in this country, and yet the very purpose of creating these governmental bureaus is to conserve the natural wealth for the benefit of all the people and not necessarily for the few with the facilities and means to exploit them for their own private gain. That is especially true of this gas proposition. Why, there is no doubt but what natural gas and oil are exploited by men with large capital in the hope of profit and much has been discovered in that way which adds to the industries of the country, of course. And so, when a wealth has been discovered, and it is a natural wealth, it ought to be in some way or other conserved for the full benefit of the people. We have found in the gas belt particularly that gas and oil are found in conjunction almost always, and the oil is capable of an immediate return on the money, but the gas is not always readily salable or controllable. The owner of an oil well will allow his gas to escape into the air in order to realize quickly a little cash out of the oil. Now, that practice may be all right from his standpoint but all wrong from the standpoint of the people who are going to need both oil and gas, and who are entitled to have this natural wealth conserved. This department, as I understand it, among other things, has a practice of instructing the ordinary prospector in the oil and gas fields that there is a way to seal up the wells and prevent the escape of the gas from the strata of the gas sand. It sends out a report and disseminates that information among the people. I do not understand they are claiming they discovered the method of reducing gasoline from gas—head gas—because I think I know the gentleman who claims to have discovered that method in his commercial operations. Yet they have a right to investigate it for the public at large and for those who think they can engage their capital in promoting that industry. In the absence of that information that industry can not be carried on——

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. I will.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. There is a statement here in this report of Mr. Burrill, or, at any rate, it is published by the United States Geological Survey, which says in 1911 about 7,500 gallons of gasoline was produced from natural gas in the United States.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That was disputed on the floor a few moments ago—that you can produce gasoline from natural gas.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes. The gas from which gasoline is produced is known technically as casing-head gas. It differs slightly in its constituents from natural gas. There is some difference among scientists as to whether casing-head gas is really natural gas or whether it is the volatile distillation of the oil, but, in any event, it exists in most oil wells.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] asks to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. The value of that consists in this, that a large number of prospectors are in the field prospecting for oil. Oil can be readily turned into money. They find gas, possibly natural gas, or else casing-head gas, and if it is casing-head gas it contains this gasoline, which can be produced by pressure. Ordinarily they would lose and the public would lose the value of that particular commodity, but the desire to conserve it is very strong among the departments of the Government, and it ought to be strong among the general public, and is as soon as any information is given to the public about it.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman explain that matter of casing-head gas a little further? Does that casing-head gas come out of the ground?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. How, then, could it be anything else but natural gas?

Mr. BORLAND. There is natural gas, the qualities and characteristics of which are well known and understood, and then there is a gas called casing-head gas, which comes out from oil wells and which may be mingled with natural gas but which is assumed to be the natural distillation from the oil.

Mr. PLATT. It is a vapor, then?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; a vapor from the oil.

Mr. MONDELL. Is it not a fact that gasoline can be produced from practically any natural gas, but that you must get a natural gas having a certain amount of moisture in it before you can make gasoline at a price that pays commercially?

Mr. BORLAND. No. My understanding in regard to that is——

Mr. MONDELL. That is a fact.

Mr. BORLAND. My understand is that there is natural gas from which you can not produce gasoline at all. I have seen that demonstrated by scientists and experts. It is called "dry gas." There is a natural gas, a gas which has mingled with it the fumes of oil, and in the last analysis the gasoline is found in the fumes of the oil, even though it be a constituent part of the natural gas. But that is only a matter of detail. In all the gas belt of West Virginia and Ohio and of Oklahoma and southern Kansas they are not concerned chiefly with exploiting that from a commercial standpoint. Natural gas is usually available, if it can be conserved, to the inhabitants of the great cities, and it ought to be conserved in most cases, not for manufacturing primarily, but for domestic use primarily. The flat dweller and the small home owner and the little housekeeper in the cities must hurry to his work and must prepare his meals in a small home, perhaps in the suburbs of the city, in a limited time. The use of natural gas and its cheapness and its cleanliness and the small space it can occupy as compared with other forms of fuel is a great advantage and a great saving to the small, limited householder in the great cities, and he is the man primarily interested in the very last analysis in preserving the natural supply of gas and fuel in this country. He is the man who must meet the fuel bill, and not the great corporation, which may choose to throw away its gas rather than go to the expense and trouble of conserving it.

But my idea is that those natural resources do not belong entirely to the corporation that happens to be exploiting a particular product, such as the oil, but if those natural products are there, they ought to be for the benefit of the entire community and of the wage earners and of the householders that are within reach of them. We would make a mistake—a very grave mistake—in allowing pure commercialism to dictate the destruction of that valuable commodity. The time may come when we would be glad to see it conserved for domestic and manufacturing use, and I hope it is not going too far to say that as to natural gas in this country Federal legislation will eventually step in and provide for its conservation, as it has done for the conservation of a great many other commodities which are of no more importance in the last analysis to the people.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Missouri yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. In Oklahoma, where the Bureau of Mines has demonstrated how this natural gas can be conserved, as stated by the gentleman, the legislature is taking action now in order to protect the gas in that State. That is brought about through the Bureau of Mines.

Mr. BORLAND. Yes. The fact is that the information furnished by the Bureau of Mines is not information furnished to some corporation for their private profit, but is furnished to the public at large, whether they want to engage in either production or consumption.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has again expired.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the Bureau of Mines should be criticized, but, on the contrary, should be commended for what the gentleman from Massachusets [Mr. GILLETT] has called to our attention, in placing bulletins and technical papers at the disposal of those in this country who are interested and disseminating throughout the length and breadth of the land information concerning the valuable and important discoveries and researches made by that new bureau of the Government. Of the commendable acts of the last Republican administration, not one stands out higher than the creation of the Bureau of Mines and the appointment of its able and efficient chief, Dr. Holmes, by former President Taft.

I know something of the value of the publications issued by this bureau, because I represent a mining district and have had transmitted to the mining companies and miners the valuable bulletins issued by the Bureau of Mines, and I know that while this bureau is comparatively young, only 4 or 5 years old, yet its great work has commended itself to the American Mining Congress, to mine operators, and to the men who work in the mines. There has been a demand upon the part of operators and miners for the Committee on Mines and Mining to build up, strengthen, and extend the operations of this valuable bureau.

Why, Mr. Chairman, if the Bureau of Mines, after making important discoveries and useful investigations, should fail or neglect to call the results to the attention of those vitally interested it would lay itself liable to the just criticism of Members of this House and of the taxpayers of this country, who want to see a return for the money expended in the creation, equipment, and maintenance of this bureau. In appropriating public money to establish and maintain this bureau it was expected to accomplish good and beneficial results. It has made good and it is very properly making known its splendid work to those most vitally interested and affected.

Why keep these bulletins and papers locked up, as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] says, in cold storage here in Washington, when they could be sent out to persons and companies who are interested in the various industries which are affected; and what better use or value to the country could this bureau be engaged in than conserving the natural resources of this great country which have been going to waste on account of a lack of knowledge of expert mining, and so forth, and in the discoveries mentioned in the papers and bulletins referred to by the gentleman from Massachusetts? I hope, Mr. Chairman, that this House will always stand by, uphold, and defend the Bureau of Mines as long as it is so well and efficiently conducted as it is under its present administration.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to be put in the light, as the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. AUSTIN] attempts, of making an attack on the usefulness of the Bureau of Mines. I recognize both the usefulness and the enthusiasm manifested by that department and its chief, and I recognize that it is only men who have a great enthusiasm in the work of their department and a desire to extend it who can be of great value; but the more there is of that enthusiasm and the more valuable a man may be the more he needs a check upon him, because these men see only what is before them. They see great opportunities, and they will branch out in every direction, regardless of expense, unless they are in some way supervised. Now, it seems to me the very arguments the gentlemen have made show that in this particular they have entered upon a field on which they ought not to encroach, because these technical papers are not meant for the public at large. The people in general are not interested in them. The people to whom they are of value are the capitalists and the corporations who are going into some great undertaking; and when doing that they are not going to rely upon the bulletins of the Bureau of Mines. They are going to investigate for themselves and find out what is the very last and best method; and while they may get interesting information from the Bureau of Mines, they can never take that as conclusive and final and sufficient. They have got to investigate and search out for themselves. So it seems to me these technical papers, which are doubtless of some value and which are intended to help these great corporations and the men who are going into these big undertakings, are not the line in which the Bureau of Mines ought to branch out; and sending out cards like this and trying to build up a constituency among people who might be interested, but to whom it seems to me they would not be of any very great use, is something which ought not to be encouraged.

Mr. FALCONER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. Yes.

Mr. FALCONER. The gentleman would not have the bureau withdraw from this field and give it to the corporations exclusively, would he?

Mr. GILLETT. The corporations themselves do this investigating, and the bureau is merely gathering together what the corporations have done.

Mr. FALCONER. Not necessarily.

Mr. GILLETT. Practically so. They just find out what the corporations have done and then publish it.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Chairman, if I may interrogate the gentleman further——

Mr. GILLETT. Certainly.

Mr. FALCONER. Is it not a fact that the department does considerable pioneer work along these lines?

Mr. GILLETT. No; I do not think it does along these lines.

Mr. FALCONER. Then the gentleman takes the position that private corporations are always in advance of the department?

Mr. GILLETT. No; not always, but generally on these lines they are. It takes enormous capital to discover these things—too much for the bureau.

Mr. FALCONER. It just occurs to me that the argument of the gentleman would seem to mean that it is his position that the Government should abandon the field to the selfish interests of the corporations or private individuals.

Mr. GILLETT. This is just helping the selfish interests.

Mr. FALCONER. It may or may not be. Let me ask the gentleman, in that connection, is it not true that the Government has taken advanced steps in trying to find out whether or not it is advisable to extract gasoline from shale, and has any private corporation in the United States done that?

Mr. GILLETT. I do not know anything about that.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, it has come in my way to learn something about this oil business. I have been associated with it in one way and another ever since I began business. I quite agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] in saying that so far as the oil business is concerned this department simply collates and collects what has been done by the various concerns engaged in the oil business. I believe it was a man up in my own county who first discovered that he could make gasoline from the gas coming from oil wells. Of course it was generally known for a long time that you can take any gas, and by pressure and refrigeration reduce it to a liquid, as in the case of oxygen, for instance. But in these oil wells—and it is true of all of them—there is a kind of gas called wet gas, which contains certain chemical compounds that by pressure and refrigeration can be reduced to a liquid. That is being done all over the oil country, and has been for years. They produce a very light gasoline, of 0.80 specific gravity, and this they mix with gasoline of the heavier quality, that has been produced by the distillation of petroleum, and in that way make a gasoline which is better than the low grade made from petroleum, and yet is not so volatile as to escape so readily as this high-grade stuff does that is made wholly from gas.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULINGS. Certainly.

Mr. BORLAND. I will ask the gentleman whether the product of this wet gas when reduced to a liquid by pressure and refrigeration is not more highly inflammable than the ordinary gasoline, and consequently can it not be carried in a small space and afterwards used with heavier gasoline?

Mr. HULINGS. It is probably not more inflammable, but it is much more volatile and more dangerous, because it evaporates so quickly. Take a spoonful of it and throw it into the air, and none of it will reach the ground.

Mr. BORLAND. As a practical proposition it is combined with heavier grades of gasoline.

Mr. HULINGS. They have been doing that and utilizing it largely in that way.

Mr. BORLAND. So that it is much more inflammable than the heavier gasoline produced in the old way.

Mr. HULINGS. I would not say more inflammable, because either of them will rapidly and almost explosively burn.

Mr. BORLAND. My understanding is that it is reduced in its production to about 15 per cent of its volume, so that it can afterwards be transported much more cheaply.

Mr. HULINGS. They have to transport it in steel barrels, because wooden barrels will not hold it, and for that reason they mix it with a heavier grade of gasoline. I do not believe that this bureau has ever invented anything along the line of the oil business. I think they have simply collated the experience of others, and made it available for any person that desired to learn it from these publications that they issue.

I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact that in this same Bureau of Mines, in their investigation of the mining industry, especially of soft coal, they have been making discoveries; that they have been making the most valuable investigations for the protection of explosions from coal-mine dust in these mines. I think it would be very shortsighted for this Congress to attempt to limit them in that very important and interesting field.

There was one question I desired to ask the chairman of the committee. Here is an appropriation of $135,000:

For investigation of mineral fuels and unfinished mineral products belonging to or for the use of the United States, with a view to their most efficient mining, preparation, treatment, and use, including personal services in the bureau at Washington, D. C., not in excess of the number and total compensation of those so employed during the fiscal year 1913.

Can the chairman say what that compensation amounted to?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman wait until we reach that item and I will give it to him?

Mr. HULINGS. I would like to say that as to the investigations of the gas business and the mineral-oil business of any sort I doubt whether the Government has any authority in that matter in territory which belongs to the States. Is it not a matter for State legislation to say how a man may utilize the product of his oil well where he has a title in fee to that property? The State, I suppose, under the right of eminent domain, might indicate or prescribe how certain wells shall be plugged or how the gas shall be taken, so that it shall be conserved, but I doubt whether the National Government has any right to do it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves that all debate on the paragraph and amendments thereto close.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigation as to the causes of mine explosions, methods of mining, especially in relation to the safety of miners, the appliances best adapted to prevent accidents, the possible improvement of conditions under which mining operations are carried on, the use of explosives and electricity, the prevention of accidents, and other inquiries and technologic investigations pertinent to the mining industry, $347,000.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I think I can get through the short statement I have to make in three minutes. I do not know whether it is true or not, but it is suggested from various sources that there is going on in this Chamber a kind of smotherbuster—not a filibuster, but a smotherbuster. I have listened now for about an hour to this debate. It is true the gentleman from New York finally moved to stop debate, and it was done. But I have listened about an hour to a discussion that seemed to me to be a part of an attempt to asphyxiate the shipping bill and probably the seamen's bill, for certain reasons, by the application of gas—dry gas, wet gas, heavy gas, light gas, Pennsylvania gas, natural gas, and all kinds of gas. [Laughter.] That is about all the debate has involved for an hour or more.

I think that there is more to this rumor than mere idle talk. I have participated here during this session in the putting through of the various appropriation bills, and although the chairman of this committee started out the other day with the resolution to rush the bill, and on Saturday afternoon exhibited a disposition to get the bill through as soon as possible, I have found that men can talk 5 minutes, 10 minutes, 15 minutes, and, as the RECORD will show, an hour has been consumed on various kinds of gas without any restraint or any attempt to suppress the debate or any attempt to expedite the bill. I think the proceeding is joined in by men on both sides of the aisle. It is a deliberate effort to obstruct legislation, and I think we ought to be more diligent. I would not presume to lecture the chairman of the committee, but I think if he would overturn the wishes of those about him and make more motions to suppress debate he would be serving the business interests of the country.

It is said that there will be an attempt to take up the Republican measure that has come over to the House, that farce which provides that ships of the Navy shall go into the merchant marine——

Mr. HULINGS Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not discussing the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. If the point of order is made, the Chair will have to sustain it.

Mr. BRYAN. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will get back to gas. Inasmuch as the gentleman from Pennsylvania wants everything discussed from a jet of gas, we will take up and discuss Pennsylvania gas. When these other matters are pending we ought to turn off the gas. That silly war challenge, the Weeks bill, ought to be made into a decent, effective merchant-marine bill, so that the ships of the Navy will not be put into commerce and our people be compelled to send freight and traffic by vessels with cannon and uniformed officers aboard. But we might put merchant vessels into the bill and give relief, and have an efficient bill, instead of having one that amounts to nothing; have one that makes the Shipping Trust protest, not one that makes the Shipping Trust applaud.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Washington having relieved the pressure on himself, due to an overaccumulation of gas, we will proceed to the next paragraph.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. TRIBBLE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 7555. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Suwanee River in the State of Florida.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigation of mineral fuels and unfinished mineral products belonging to or for the use of the United States, with a view to their most efficient mining, preparation, treatment, and use, including personal services in the bureau at Washington, D. C., not in excess of the number and total compensation of those so employed during the fiscal year 1913, $135,000.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 97, strike out lines 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, and insert the following:

"For investigation of mineral fuels and unfinished mineral products belonging to or for the use of the United States, with a view to their most efficient mining, preparation, treatment, selection, and the most efficient use of fuels for all purposes; for the analyzing and testing of all fuels to be selected and sampled in accordance with Bureau of Mines specifications, including personal services in the bureau at Washington, D. C., not in excess of the number and total compensation of those so employed during the fiscal year 1913: Provided, That no part of any money appropriated by this or any other act shall be used for the purchase of fuel in continental United States for the United States, unless expended in cooperation, when practicable, with and under the advice and direction of the Bureau of Mines, $135,000."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, this changes the paragraph that is now in the bill so as to make it the duty of the Bureau of Mines to select the coal which is adapted to a particular plan where the Government plant may be located or particular equipment that may be used. It puts this selection with the Bureau of Mines, together with the testing, which is already there now. Since the Government has been testing coal according to a scientific basis as to the heat units in the coal it has been of great saving in all departments of the Government, wherever it may be, and yet the Bureau of Mines has no control over the equipment or matters of that kind. For instance, there has been installed in a branch of the Government an equipment which is adapted to the use of coal in Illinois. It seems strange that that should be the case, and yet it is true. By changing that equipment and having it properly adapted to coal that may be within a certain neighborhood or area where it is to be used the Government would be able to save a considerable amount of money. At Fort Bayard, N. Mex., by change of certain equipment and showing them how they could use certain coal it was shown that they could use a very much cheaper coal. That was put in operation and existed for a little while, but was abandoned, and they have gone back to the old plan again; the Government is paying the extravagant price again. In California, where coal is shipped by the Government for use on the boats in the harbor and other uses, they use an expensive coal when they could just as well get coal on the Pacific coast which would save five or six dollars a ton. There is no occasion for this. Last year in the War Department alone in the buying of coal according to this basis there was a saving made of something like twenty-five to thirty thousand dollars.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman think it would be wise to give the Bureau of Mines authority to prescribe the kind of coal that the Navy is to use?

Mr. FOSTER. They do it now; it is done now. The bureau tests the coal for the Navy.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, no; they do not.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, yes.

Mr. MONDELL. They have no authority over the Navy.

Mr. FOSTER. They have no authority over the Navy, of course.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman's amendment would give the Bureau of Mines authority to say to any department of the Government, including the Navy, "You shall use this sort of coal or that sort of coal."

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. It is the selection of the kind of coal that is best suited for their use.

Mr. MONDELL. Does not the gentleman think that would be dangerous when it comes to the fighting branch of the Government?

Mr. FOSTER. No; I do not think it is near as dangerous as it is now to the Government to permit in many instances some clerk in the department to select the kind of coal used in the department. The Bureau of Mines tests all of the coal used by the Navy. For instance, take the Panama Canal. When bids were presented for coal a certain firm in the country presented an analysis of coal which the Bureau of Mines said was not correct, which they had been using, but it was found by putting the selection of that coal in the hands of the Bureau of Mines for use in the canal there was a saving to the Government of $40,000 a year. There are many instances of the kind where that can be done. As an illustration of the kind of selection the Government makes now, I have here a picture of the Knickerbocker Hotel, here in Washington, and then there is a picture of the Cox Building, which is a Government office building. We find that the Government office there is using anthracite coal with approximately 13,500 British thermal units per pound and paying $6.65 per ton for it, and that the Knickerbocker Hotel buys coal of approximately 14,500 British thermal units per pound, bituminous coal, for $4.50 a ton. That is the way that the Government in many instances buys its coal. I believe if some system were put in operation whereby we could select that coal in a proper way and say to these departments, "This is the coal that is most economical for your department" many thousands of dollars would be saved.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. HULINGS. The illustration the gentleman has given is a comparison between anthracite coal and bituminous coal. Anthracite coal has only 13,500 British thermal units to the pound——

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is not talking to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. The gentleman from New York reserved the point of order, and under the practice of the House the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] is discussing the merits of the proposition, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS] interrogated him. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. BRYAN. Is the gentleman debating the point of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is debating the merits of the proposed amendment.

Mr. BRYAN. Has the point of order been decided?

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order was reserved, and under the practice of the House the Chair is not called upon to rule while it is reserved. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois that his time be extended for five minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is a very important matter, and the gentleman from Illinois is chairman of the Committee on Mines and Mining.

Mr. BRYAN. I know that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And I think any reasonable discussion should be permitted.

Mr. BRYAN. I want to ask the gentleman from New York if he is going to make the point of order. Is it so very important that the gentleman is going to make the point of order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not certain.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Chairman, I was recognized to ask a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor. Does the gentleman yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. FOSTER. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS].

Mr. HULINGS. I desire to ask this: If the gentleman thinks that the illustration he has given here, making a comparison between anthracite and bituminous coal, is entirely fair, for this reason, that in the ordinary combustion of bituminous coal there is a very large portion of it that escapes during the process of combustion, while in the case of the anthracite coal the efficiency is very much higher?

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania falls into an error which is very often fallen into by men who do not remember that we buy coal upon the basis of so much heat to the unit of coal, and that in buying anthracite coal, which has the highest price, it gives you no more heat than does the bituminous that has the same number——

Mr. HULINGS. That is true if you get the same efficiency; but you never get the same degree of efficiency from the burning of bituminous coal, because a large portion of it goes off in the process of combustion in the way of smoke, and so forth.

Mr. FOSTER. That does not happen where there is a proper furnace equipment. It might be if it were done in the old way, but coal is not burned in such an unscientific way as it was years ago.

Mr. SLEMP. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. SLEMP. Has the gentleman's observation been applied to coal used in the Navy also?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SLEMP. It would apply to the Navy as well as to all other departments of the Government.

Mr. FOSTER. I will say this: In the last naval bill there was provided $75,000 for securing coal from the Matanuska coal field of Alaska, and the Secretary of the Navy put that under the control of the Bureau of Mines. They went there and mined that coal and hauled it to tidewater and brought it to the States, and that coal was tested upon the Maryland, I think, on the Pacific Ocean. An engineer of the Bureau of Mines went on the Maryland and saw the actual test of the coal. That coal was actually tested, and there is a letter in here from the commander of the Maryland showing how successfully and in what a gentlemanly way that test was conducted, and that it was to the satisfaction of the Navy, and it demonstrated beyond all question that the Matanuska coal was a kind of coal that could be used in the Navy. The Bureau of Mines tests this coal now; we have no new proposition so far as that is concerned, but what I am trying to get at is that when these tests are made and it is determined it is an economical coal for the Government to buy, that the Bureau of Mines shall select that coal and that these men will buy the kind of coal that ought to be bought as an economical proposition to the Government.

Mr. SLEMP. Would it be the gentleman's idea that the Government would bear the expense of testing coal that belongs to private individuals, corporations, and so forth, or that they should bear it?

Mr. FOSTER. This is for the Navy; that belongs to the United States; yes. The Bureau of Mines tests coal. They tested coal where an inquiry came from South America to have those tests to be supplied to those people who want to purchase our coal. They made their test, and I understand sales of coal have been made as a result of that test.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I understood the gentleman to say just now that one of the purposes of the amendment of the gentleman was so that the Bureau of Mines could select the coal used by the different departments of the Government. How would the selection be made?

Mr. FOSTER. It is the recommendation or selection, as you may call it, wherever it is to be obtained. Of course there might be cases where it would be impracticable to make that——

Mr. MANN. But how would you select? Would you select it from some mine or how would it be done?

Mr. FOSTER. No; it would select certain coals that would be the most economical to use.

Mr. MANN. They do it now.

Mr. FOSTER. But in some instances——

Mr. MANN. Coal is selected based upon an analysis?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. It does not mean a certain coal to be used, does it?

Mr. FOSTER. Not a particular coal of a particular mine. It does not mean that.

Mr. MANN. I can not understand how the bureau can select the coal.

Mr. FOSTER. For instance, say the department is going to buy some coal for Fort Snellings. Say that they have bids for certain coal to be sent there. Those coals would be analyzed by the Bureau of Mines. Now, that would be determined by taking into consideration the equipment and everything connected with that particular point and an analysis of the coals which are sent would be selected for the particular place.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. FOSTER. And they would say to them this is the coal that should be selected.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] is doubtless very desirable, but the effect of this amendment is so far-reaching that, I think, it would be very unwise to attempt to legislate upon this bill. I have been examining the amendment of the gentleman for some time, and I have not yet been able to ascertain just how far it would extend the present authority of the Bureau of Mines.

Mr. FOSTER. I will say to the gentleman from New York, if he will permit me, that at this time the Bureau of Mines simply tests the coal when called upon by the different departments. They test it and give the analysis that the coal shows. That is as far as they go. They do not go any further now.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Under this amendment, as I read it and understand it, the Bureau of Mines practically is to select the equipment for the burning of the coal.

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, no.

Mr. MANN. Well, then, what does it say?

Mr. FOSTER. If it does, it is not so intended.

Mr. MANN. Then the Bureau of Mines would tell the Navy, for example, what kind of equipment they should have for burning the coal, and, possibly, the kind of engines they should use.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, that is not intended; but if they happen to have a certain kind of engine, such as the Government has in certain places, or certain boilers adapted to particular kinds of coal, which they can not use, it seems to me somebody ought to select the equipment that would be adapted to the use of certain coal.

Mr. MANN. Of course the department that uses it ought to control that. I do not see how you can allow the Bureau of Mines to determine what kind of equipment they must have.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think it is intended that that should be the case.

Mr. MANN. I understood that was the purpose.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the uncertainties are too great, and I am compelled to insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For inquiries and scientific and technologic investigations concerning the mining, preparation, treatment, and utilization of ores and other mineral substances, with a view to improving health conditions and increasing safety, efficiency, economic development, and conserving resources through the prevention of waste in the mining, quarrying, metallurgical, and other mineral industries; to inquire into the economic conditions affecting these industries: Provided, That no part thereof may be used for investigation in behalf of any private party, nor shall any part thereof be used for work authorized or required by law to be done and that is being done by any other branch of the public service, $100,000.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] offers the following amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 98, line 1, after the word "service," insert "nor shall any part of any appropriation in this or any other act be used for work that is authorized or being done by the Bureau of Mines."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] reserves a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, this limitation, as I understand, upon the Bureau of Mines is for the purpose of preventing that bureau from entering any field that is now occupied by another department of the Government. What I had tried to do in my amendment was to prevent other departments from entering the field of the Bureau of Mines and limiting it, and saying to them that they must keep off the Bureau of Mines and let that bureau perform the work that it is intended it should do. Now, I submit that is but a fair proposition—that while the Bureau of Mines should keep on its own grounds, other departments should keep on their own grounds, too.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Who is to be the determining factor as to the particular province of each bureau?

Mr. FOSTER. The heads of the departments.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. In case of disagreement between the heads of departments, who should come in?

Mr. FOSTER. This would certainly be a limitation, which would be decided by the Comptroller of the Treasury.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. Suppose the law should allow different departments to overlap. The proposition is that the other departments should be excluded, and the Bureau of Mines would be authorized to do a particular kind of work, although the law already allowed the other departments to do it. Is that the proposition?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Some classes of work are authorized to be done by more than one branch of the public service.

Mr. GILLETT. That is just the question that I asked.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Only one branch should do it. I have suggested to the gentleman that he modify the amendment so as to apply it only to appropriations carried in this bill and to make the language correspond to the language already in the bill, so that the amendment would read: "Nor shall any part of any appropriation in this act be available for the performance of work authorized and being done by the Bureau of Mines."

Mr. GILLETT. But, after all, is that fair?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes. We apply that rule to the Bureau of Mines.

Mr. FOSTER. Why not apply it to the others, too?

Mr. GILLETT. Suppose there is a case where different branches of the Government have authority to do a particular kind of work. Now, by this you are taking it away from the others and giving it to the Bureau of Mines. Why would it be any more right to take it away from the other departments and give it to the Bureau of Mines than to take it away from the Bureau of Mines and give it to the other departments?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Why not strike out all of the provision after the word "party," in line 23, page 97? The trouble that my friend suggested is that it still further confuses, if he will allow me, a bad situation. What we have done in this item is to legislate against the Bureau of Mines. Then, if I understand the proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER], he would insist on a provision under which it might be possible that none of the bureaus of the public service could do certain classes of work where they are now authorized by law to do it. The fact is, it is not fair to the Bureau of Mines to legislate against it alone, as we have done in this bill, because there are many fields of the public service where two or more bureaus legitimately work, although they do not work on a subject at the same angle, nor do they investigate exactly the same phases or features of a matter. They have their legitimate work, but it is connected with the same subject matter.

Now, we have legislated the Bureau of Mines out of any field heretofore occupied by any other bureau, even though they occupy it from a different angle and from a different viewpoint and for a different purpose and along a different line. We should not have any legislation of this sort, but the committees should see to it that the bureaus are kept out of each other's jurisdiction as far as possible, because if you legislate along this line at all you must legislate against one or the other of two or more bureaus.

Mr. FOSTER. I think what is intended here is that if you are going to limit the Bureau of Mines, it is only fair that the other departments should be limited so that they should not take that work away from it which it can perform better than any other department.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. FOSTER. In securing the statistics in reference to mine accidents, if that is to be done by another department of the Government, it seems to me it is unfair to the Bureau of Mines, when they are in that work all the time, that that should be taken away from them. But without something of this kind, it must necessarily be taken away, and they would lose that part of the work.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not mean that this provision in the bill now would take away anything from the Bureau of Mines?

Mr. FOSTER. I should think so.

Mr. MANN. This is the existing law. I suppose they are complying with it.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope they are. But suppose some other department comes into the field? They have put in these new words this year:

And that is being done.

Mr. MANN. That broadens the scope of the Bureau of Mines, instead of restricting it. Under existing law they are forbidden to do any work which is authorized to be done by any other department. I do not think they pay much attention to it, but in a way they do. Now the committee have added these words so that any other department must not only be authorized to do it, but must actually be doing it.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. That broadens the scope of the Bureau of Mines, instead of restricting it.

Mr. FOSTER. As I understand, then, that excludes the Bureau of Mines from doing the work.

Mr. MANN. Only when the other bureau is authorized and is doing it. Under the existing law the Bureau of Mines is forbidden to do the work if the other department is authorized to do it, whether it is doing it or not. Now the committee have added to the language, forbidding the Bureau of Mines to do it only if another department is authorized to do it and is doing it.

Mr. FOSTER. The provisions in some of these are broad, and I know they have begun, where the Bureau of Mines has been doing it for several years.

Mr. MANN. But they are not doing it now, if they are following the law.

Mr. FOSTER. They are doing it?

Mr. MANN. I mean the Bureau of Mines.

Mr. FOSTER. They have been doing certain work, and the other departments are beginning to do that work. Now, what I want to do is to keep them out of the work of the Bureau of Mines, along with the others.

Mr. MANN. If the Bureau of Mines have ever lost jurisdiction of anything they have commenced to do, I have never heard of it.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope they have not, because they are doing good work, and I hope they will continue that work.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman's amendment would forbid the Census Office to make any study of any of these industries. Certainly he does not want to do that.

Mr. FOSTER. No. It is simply to confine the other departments to their particular work.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman's amendment would accomplish that, because one of the provisions is to permit the Bureau of Mines to inquire into economic conditions affecting industries relating to minerals, and so forth. The Census Office has to do that to make up the census report this year. The gentleman's amendment would forbid the Census Office to pay any attention to the industries relating to mines and minerals.

Mr. FOSTER. If the Bureau of Mines is securing these statistics, I do not see any reason for having them duplicated.

Mr. MANN. I do not think they are duplicated. If they are, the Bureau of Mines is doing the duplicating, because the Census Bureau is required to do this work, and the Bureau of Mines is merely permitted to do it. The gentleman's amendment would forbid the bureau that is required to do the work and turn it over to a bureau that has no facilities to do it, but is permitted to do it.

Mr. FOSTER. I think this only limits the departments to their particular work.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman withhold the point of order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will withhold it.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois should be adopted, even if it were not subject to a point of order, because it would simply further confuse a bad situation, as I said a moment ago. This legislation, beginning with the word "nor" in line 23, page 97, and extending to the end of the paragraph, should be stricken out. We have no such legislation limiting any other bureaus of the Government. The result is that if the Bureau of Mines strictly interprets its authority under this legislation, then the Bureau of Mines is prevented from examining and investigating, let us say, the question of gases in mines, because the Bureau of Labor is also investigating that question from the viewpoint of the health and welfare of the miners. Now, the investigation of the matter of gases by the Bureau of Mines is an investigation with a view to determining how the accumulation of gases may be prevented and mines may be protected against gases; how explosions may be prevented; how miners who are the victims of gases may be rescued; and all those matters that properly come within the jurisdiction of the Bureau of Mines. There is a proper work for the Bureau of Labor, which is welfare work in the mines, and work having to do with the conditions of the labor. We do not say to the Bureau of Labor, "You shall not investigate this class of work, because the Bureau of Mines is investigating it from another angle," but we say to the Bureau of Mines, "You shall not do any work that any other bureau is either authorized to do or is doing, whether it is authorized by law to do it or not." You can not by legislation draw an accurate line between the activities of these bureaus. The best you can do is to exercise the control that Congress has over appropriations.

If this provision were stricken out, then the Bureau of Mines would be situated just as the other bureaus are, and would not be expected to occupy the same field in the same way and for the same purpose as they are occupied by other bureaus. Of course it is a question largely of what the word "work" means. what we intend by the word "work." I take it for granted that the Bureau of Mines is giving a liberal interpretation to it. If they are not, they must be tremendously hampered by this provision. I think they would be justified in holding that where they are doing a certain line of work, although it relates to the same subject matter as that under investigation by another bureau, if their work is along a different line, having a different object in view and a different purpose, they may continue that work. And yet there is likely to be a conflict of jurisdiction—there is likely to be some feeling engendered in a case of that kind. We should not put an embargo against the activities of one bureau in favor of all other bureaus. The proper thing to do is to strike out the entire provision. The gentleman from New York will recall that this was discussed somewhat in the subcommittee, that we were not entirely happy over the language, but even the genius of the gentleman from New York has not as yet evolved anything to take its place.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks one provision in the amendment, "or in any other act," makes it clearly subject to the point of order. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 98, line 1, after the word "service," insert the following: "Nor shall any part of any appropriation in this act be used for work that is authorized and is being done by the Bureau of Mines."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment. It is not germane to this paragraph of the bill. It might possibly be offered at the last end of the bill, but it is not germane to this paragraph of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER].

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that this is directly in line with the provision already in the bill, and that this is a further limitation. I do not see why it is not germane to this particular item.

Mr. MANN. It does not relate to this particular appropriation. It is not germane to this paragraph.

Mr. FOSTER. It seems to me that it is clearly so; I may be wrong about it. I would not know where else to offer it.

Mr. MANN. The limitation in this paragraph relates to the appropriation carried by this paragraph only. It does not relate to the other appropriations carried by the bill. It seems to me that a limitation relating to all the other appropriations in the bill is not germane.

Mr. FOSTER. It seems to me that it is germane because it applies to this particular paragraph and is a limitation.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Colorado desire to discuss the point of order?

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. No; I propose to offer an amendment.

Mr. FOWLER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire discuss the point of order?

Mr. FOWLER. Just for a moment. I think this is clearly a limitation upon the appropriation. The paragraph provides for a certain amount of money to be appropriated for certain purposes, and it has been repeatedly held that where an appropriation is sought to be made, Congress may place any limitation on the use of the money that it may deem proper. I have recently gone over the authorities upon limitations, and in every instance where it was sought to place a limitation on the appropriation the Chair has overruled points of order. I can not see that this amendment carries with it anything except a limitation.

In 1910, in the bill for appropriations for the Navy, there was a provision for experiments on armament, and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBSON] offered an amendment that no part of the appropriation should be used except it be used under certain conditions of distance where the experiment was to be made. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] was in the chair, and he held that it was a limitation on the appropriation, and I think properly so. It has been repeatedly held that unless the amendment carries a direction to the department in the way of new legislation, limiting the department to do that which the law authorizes it to do, then it is a limitation on the appropriation and is in order.

Another point: If this amendment is subject to a point of order, the latter part of the paragraph is subject also to a point of order. If the latter part is subject to a point of order, then this ought to be in order, because it is germane to the subject matter and deals with the very same subject matter that the latter part of the paragraph deals with. It appears to me that on any ground that we may take it, from a parliamentary standpoint the amendment is not subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois was not on the ground that it was otherwise than a limitation, but on the ground that it was offered in a place in the bill where it was not germane. The Chair has the greatest respect for the opinion of the gentleman from Illinois on parliamentary questions. The Chair has considered this amendment, which in the opinion of the Chair is a limitation, and it is offered to a provision making an appropriation for the Bureau of Mines, and therefore the Chair overrules the point of order. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. FOSTER) there were—ayes 10, noes 25.

So the amendment was lost.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment. I move to strike out the language beginning on line 23, page 97, down to the figures "$100,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 97, line 23, after the word "party," strike out the following language: "Nor shall any part thereof be used for work authorized or required by law to be done and that is being done by any other branch of the public service."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

For per diem, subject to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, in lieu of subsistence at a rate not exceeding $5 when absent on official business from his designated headquarters, and for actual necessary traveling expenses of said inspector, $2,500.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order to the paragraph. This mine inspector in Alaska is there permanently, is he not?

Mr. FITZGERALD. He is in Alaska, but traveling all the time; he covers the whole Territory.

Mr. MANN. He gets a salary of $3,000, and $2,500 beside; that is, he has his subsistence all the time, besides the salary. I suppose he has to purchase his clothing himself, unless it is given to him.

Mr. FITZGERALD. His headquarters are at Juneau, and when he is away from headquarters he gets subsistence.

Mr. MANN. He is away all of the time, is he not?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Most of the time, I think. I think he is away from headquarters the better part of the time—that is, if he is trying to do the work that should be done.

Mr. MANN. If he is performing his work, he is. It seems to me we do pretty well when we pay a man a salary and then pay his board all of the time besides, and at that probably more than it costs him.

Mr. FITZGERALD. From the information before the committee the cost of living in Alaska is pretty high.

Mr. MANN. The law limits the subsistence to $4.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The law limits a per diem in lieu of subsistence to $4, but yesterday we fixed a per diem of the inspectors in the General Land Office at $5.

Mr. MANN. They travel only occasionally, I take it, while this man is traveling all of the time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The requests for per diem for employees in Alaska from all of the departments of the Government is an allowance of $8.

Mr. MANN. Yes. A good many of the departments would like to pay a man a good salary and in addition allow him quite a good rake-off from a per diem in lieu of subsistence.

Mr. BRYAN. Does the gentleman take into consideration the fact that a mine inspector, going from one to the other of these different diggings, has to go a great part of the time with a pack and a dog team, away from the inhabited sections we spoke of yesterday, which is very expensive traveling?

Mr. MANN. He gets that paid in addition, and it is very safe to say that having traveling expenses with a dog team paid his subsistence does not cost him $5 per day. But that is what he gets. I am going to make the point of order against it. I think it is subject to the point of order under the sundry civil appropriation act of last year, which limits the per diem in lieu of subsistence to $4 a day. I make the point of order against the paragraph.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then I shall offer the paragraph as an amendment, inserting $4 a day instead of $5.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order against the paragraph, and the Chair sustains the point of order. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 99, after line 8, insert the following:

"For per diem, subject to such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, in lieu of subsistence at a rate not exceeding $4 when absent on official business from his designated headquarters, and for actual necessary traveling expenses of said inspector, $2,500."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I understand that on yesterday there was a provision inserted in the bill for a per diem in lieu of subsistence of $5, which formerly provided for $6. It was reduced to $5. Is it now proposed in this amendment to make a reduction from $5 to $4 a day? I would ask the chairman of the committee why it is that the others should receive $5 per day traveling through Alaska and this one $4 a day?

Mr. FITZGERALD. My opinion is they should receive $5 per day, but as such a provision is obnoxious to the rule, if any one objects, the only thing I can do is to offer an amendment that is in order under the rule.

Mr. FOSTER. There is no reason why one man should receive $4 a day and another $5.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman from Illinois said that his objection is that the inspectors of the General Land Office travel only occasionally, while this man is traveling all of the time and has an allowance that will equalize any excess the others have.

Mr. MANN. These land agents are now receiving a per diem at the rate of $6, and that was reduced to $5. This mining inspector is now receiving a per diem of $5, and this would reduce him to $4. It takes a dollar off each one.

Mr. FOSTER. Why should one have five and the other four?

Mr. MANN. Why should one have six and the other five?

Mr. FOSTER. There is no reason in the world that I know.

Mr. MANN. I think there is a very good reason, though I may be mistaken.

Mr. FOSTER. That is what I am trying to find out.

Mr. MANN. My understanding—and I do not assert it to be a fact—is that the mining inspector is away from his headquarters practically all of the time, while the others are not. There is a good deal of difference in the real cost. I may be mistaken about that.

Mr. FOSTER. What I do not understand is that when we are paying a per diem in lieu of subsistence why we should expect these men to make any money out of it. What difference does it make?

Mr. MANN. I do not think they ought to make any money out of subsistence.

Mr. FOSTER. Nor do I.

Mr. MANN. But I have no doubt that this mining inspector practically lives off the per diem and has his salary of $3,000 net.

Mr. FOSTER. That may be so. I do not know.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to it if he does. If we allow it, I do not blame him for doing it.

Mr. FOSTER. It seems to me it is hardly proper to allow one five and the other four.

Mr. MANN. We make a reduction of $1 in each case.

Mr. FOSTER. It may be that both ought to be reduced.

Mr. MANN. That may be. I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

In all, Bureau of Mines, $757,300.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of extending my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an article from the Colorado Springs Evening Telegraph, giving an account of a shipment of ore very recently made from the Cresson mine, in the Cripple Creek district, the value of which amounted to $361,000. This shipment was made in five cars, the first-grade ore in the shipment running 205 ounces of gold to the ton and the second grade running 104 ounces, which, figuring 25 tons to the carload, gives the amount of the highest grade at $205,000 for the two cars, the entire shipment having a total value, as I stated, of $361,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The article is as follows:

[From the Colorado Springs Evening Telegraph, Jan. 27, 1915.]

CRESSON SHIPMENT BREAKS RECORD HELD BY ISABELLA COMPANY—TOTAL WILL BE ABOUT $361,000, ACCORDING TO "CONTROLS" MADE AT COPELAND SAMPLER

About $361,000 will be the total returns from the shipment of five carloads of high-grade ore from the famous vug of the Cresson mine, according to the control assays made by the Copeland sampler of Cripple Creek, which sampled the ore yesterday. The ore was divided into two classes, the highest grade being loaded in two cars, and a second grade in three cars averaging about 25 tons to the carload.

The controls reported to-day show that the first-grade ore will run about 205 ounces in gold to the ton, and the second grade about 104 ounces. Figuring 25 tons to the carload gives 50 tons of highest grade and 75 tons of second grade. The two cars of highest grade will therefore produce a total of $205,000, and the three cars of second grade will total about $156,000, making a grand total of $361,000 for the shipment, not including the silver values. This is as close an estimate as can be made until the final returns on the shipment are received from the smelter at Omaha, to which place the ore was shipped. The sampler controls, however, are very accurate, and it is not expected that the final figures will vary much either way from the above.

In any event, it is now certain that the shipment from the Cresson is the record shipment from the Cripple Creek district, and its value is all the more impressive when it is considered that the ore forms only a portion of the gold found in one chamber no larger than the ordinary living room in a house.

The previous record shipment from the Cripple Creek district was that made several years ago by the Isabella Mines Co., which shipped one carload that aggregated about $229,000.

Among the high-grade ore shipments by the mines of the United States, that made by the Cresson is surpassed only by a shipment of five carloads in 1907 from the Mohawk mine in Goldfield, Nev., which collected its highest-grade ore for a period of three or four months and sent out one shipment that netted approximately $490,000 in gold and silver.

The Cresson has also shipped to the Golden Cycle mill several carloads of ore from the treasure chamber which have run 15 ounces of gold to the ton, an average of about $300 to the ton, or $7,500 to the carload. It is known that returns have been received on at least three carloads of this grade.

The Clerk read as follows:

For all expenditures authorized by the act of June 17, 1902 (32 Stats., p. 388), and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, known as the reclamation law, and all other acts under which expenditures from said fund are authorized, including salaries in the city of Washington and elsewhere; rent of office quarters in the city of Washington, $8,040, and for rent elsewhere; examination of estimates for appropriations in the field; printing and binding; law books, books of reference, periodicals, engineering and statistical publications, not exceeding $600; purchase, maintenance, and operation of horse-drawn or motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles; per diem in lieu of subsistence, when allowed, pursuant to section 13 of the sundry civil appropriation act approved August 1, 1914; payment of damages caused to the owners of lands or private property of any kind by reason of the operations of the United States, its officers or employees, in the survey, construction, operation, or maintenance of irrigation works, and which may be compromised by agreement between the claimant and the Secretary of the Interior; and compensation to artisans and laborers for injuries under the act of May 30, 1908 (35 Stats., p. 556), namely:

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, can the gentleman say how many automobiles this service has now?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They have motor-propelled vehicles on almost every project.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I have no doubt; but how many to the project on an average?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am trying to find out, I do not remember the number of automobiles, but this provision is largely for motor cycles. They are using them out there largely for ditch riders and others.

Mr. MANN. Well, I am not criticizing them for using them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think I have a statement of the number of automobiles, but I do not just recall.

Mr. MANN. Oh, very well.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will permit, I think there is a statement on page 316 of the hearings of the automobiles in the service, the number, the power, and the cost.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of calling the attention of the committee to this fact: That, following the practice in connection with the examination of the estimates of the Panama Canal, the committee has made provision here to permit, if they deem it advisable, an examination of the estimates of these various reclamation projects. The tremendous advantage that will result to Congress and those who are engaged in the work made this seem to be desirable. The attention of the committee is called to it, so Members will understand, in the event that hereafter it should be determined a special committee should visit these projects for the purpose of examining and ascertaining the information that will be of value, that the matter was done with the full cognizance of the House. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will.

Mr. HAWLEY. Are these motor-propelled vehicles automobiles or Ford machines?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They are mostly Fords. [Laughter.] While they are not expensive automobiles, they are very serviceable, and these machines are more useful than high-priced cars would be.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I notice the bill says nothing about how long the appropriations shall be available. I have been looking over some of the statutes regarding this matter and it is not clear to me, in view of the number of statutes upon the subject, that this should not in some way be made available longer than for the year for which the appropriation is made.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the Secretary of the Interior requested that provision be inserted making the appropriations available until expended. The request was, in my opinion, due to a misapprehension of the law. In the first place, there is doubt whether it will be advisable to make appropriations available until expended. The moneys appropriated are all payable out of the "reclamation fund." If the money were made available until expended, should a sum considerably in excess of what would eventually be used be appropriated for a project, that sum would still remain to the credit of the project, to be used at some future time without further action by Congress, and be segregated out of the fund and perhaps prevent the making of appropriations that properly should be made for other projects. Under the law, as this appropriation is made for the fiscal year, the money can all be expended within that year, or that part which is not expended by the end of the year remains available for two years, to meet the obligations which were incurred during the year, or to meet obligations for contracts properly made during the year. Section 3690 of the Revised Statutes provides:

All balances of appropriations contained in the annual appropriation bills and made specifically for the service of any fiscal year, and remaining unexpended at the expiration of such fiscal year shall only be applied to the payment of expenses properly incurred during that year, or to the fulfillment of contracts properly made within that year; and balances not needed for such purposes shall be carried to the surplus fund.

That is all that is applicable to this provision. The act of June 20, 1874, limiting to two years the time within which the unexpended balances should be available, commonly referred to as the "covering-in act," provides that at the end of two years after the expiration of the fiscal year for which appropriations are made the balances then unexpended shall be covered back into the Treasury. In this instance it will be covered back into the reclamation fund.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Is it the opinion of the gentleman that the act to which he refers is not changed in any respect by section 7 of the act of August 24, 1912?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No. The section of the sundry civil bill to which the gentleman refers was designed to correct a certain ruling of the comptroller. The Comptroller of the Treasury had held that certain appropriations made for a specific purpose did not come within the provisions of the covering-in act, and the appropriations continued available indefinitely. The appropriations for the Reclamation Service would be affected by section 7 of the sundry civil act of 1912 to this extent: That it would be impossible to construe these appropriations as specific indefinite appropriations which would be affected by the covering-in act. The appropriations made here for the Reclamation Service would be the same as appropriations made for any other service for which annual appropriations are made. That is, the money can all be expended within the year, or if it is not actually expended within two years after the expiration of the fiscal year, the balance of it is available to make payments for work done within the year or to meet contract obligations where the contract was properly made. That is to say, where a contractor might be doing a certain work on a reclamation project he might be paid up to the 1st of May and then might continue working until the 30th of June; then for two years after the 30th of June the balance of the appropriation is available to pay any moneys due on that contract up to that 30th of June.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman is correct in that construction——

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no doubt about that——

Mr. SMITH of Texas. And I am not prepared to say he is not, that would be all right.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Secretary of the Interior, I think, after consultation with the Reclamation Service, either misapprehended that condition or else the service may be somewhat variable under appropriations that have lapsed. They have been conducting this work heretofore without any possibility of having an appropriation lapse. Probably there is a natural fear on their part that the thing will not work out in a satisfactory manner. Now, the Committee on Appropriations——

Mr. SMITH of Texas. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me a moment, if these appropriations should lapse at the end of the year, of course it would put the Reclamation Service to a great disadvantage in making contracts.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I was about to say that the Committee on Appropriations, in making recommendations of these items, endeavored to recommend such sums as would enable the Reclamation Service without embarrassment to continue the work upon the projects during the next fiscal year, and while all of the money requested was not given in every instance, in those instances where there was a reduction in the amount recommended it was in the belief and confident conviction that the service would not be affected. For that reason for this year the 10 per cent interchangeable provision was included. There are two reasons for that. One was the statement of the head of the Reclamation Service as to the manner in which it had been necessary to prepare the estimates and the uncertainty as to whether it would be possible to make them with that close accuracy which would be essential to definitely determine how much could be expended. The other was the fact that the service was being put upon this basis for the first time, and that made it desirable to give them some leeway, so that the work should not possibly be embarrassed.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I yield.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know whether I clearly understood the statement of the gentleman from New York with regard to the time for which these sums would be available, but what I did understand the gentleman to say was this—and I think the gentleman perhaps, if I correctly understood him, has not the understanding of the matter that I have—I understood the gentleman from New York to say that these appropriations were available for any work done during the year, and for any work done on a contract during the year.

Now, my understanding is that these appropriations are available for any work done during the year, whether paid for during the year or not. They are also available for any work done on any contract properly made within the year, whether the work on that contract is performed within the year or within two years thereafter.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think my statement was perhaps too restricted regarding the contract work. For instance, if an appropriation of $500,000 is made upon a project and authority exists to make a contract up to $500,000, it makes no difference whether the work is performed within that fiscal year or not. It may be performed under that contract in the next fiscal year, and the money is still available to meet the obligation arising in that way.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. MONDELL. After discussing this matter with the gentleman from New York the other day, I called up the comptroller's office and asked them if there had been any questions raised, having in mind those words, "contracts properly made," as to whether a contract was properly made if it were made late in the fiscal year. I had heard that such a question had been raised several years ago with regard to a contract made on the last day of the fiscal year. I think it was a naval contract. But even in that case I understand it was decided that as it was a proper contract, and that although none of the work was done during the fiscal year, the sum was available at any time within two years after the expiration of the fiscal year.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. HAYDEN. Conceding that the chairman is correct, so far as contracts are concerned, how about work done under force account?

Mr. FITZGERALD. As to work done under force account, the work must be actually performed during the fiscal year, and then the money is available to settle those accounts two years thereafter. It would not be available for work done after the 30th of June. In every department of the Government, of course, moneys for a current fiscal year, for instance, will be paid after the 30th of June on obligations.

Mr. HAYDEN. I understood that. The chief disadvantage, it seems to me, of not allowing this money to be expended beyond the fiscal year is that it happened before, when the Congress did not pass the appropriation until after the 1st of July, that work done in this service under the force account would be tied up.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Under these rulings I doubt if it would be. That is really an exceptional situation. The disadvantages that would come from making the money available until expended I have already pointed out. For instance, if $500,000 were appropriated to build a project and $250,000 were actually expended, the remaining money would be to the credit of that project; and if it remained there years afterwards, some one might come along, without action on the part of Congress, and expend it in a way not contemplated. And, again, if the amount were to remain available until expended, an attempt might be made to use it at some time when the condition of the reclamation fund would not permit it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Yuma project, Arizona-California: For maintenance, operation, continuation of construction, and incidental operations, $725,000.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arizona offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 102, line 3, after the word "operations," strike out "$725,000" and insert "$934,000."

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I have offered this amendment, restoring to the Yuma reclamation project the amount estimated by the department, because I am not satisfied with the explanation made last Saturday, on behalf of the Committee on Appropriations, by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] as to the reason for this reduction. The gentleman from Wyoming said that this action was taken by the committee for two reasons—first, that the committee understood that this appropriation was in the nature of an insurance against extraordinary floods on the Colorado River, and second, that they were influenced to take this action because of the testimony given by Gen. Marshall at the hearings, to the effect that the river bed at Yuma had lowered some 7 feet, and that levees were, therefore, not needed.

I want to say that my information does not agree with the conclusion reached by the gentleman from Wyoming and the committee.

In the first place, certain levee work must be done on this project. It is immaterial whether it is done this year or next year, as far as the expense is concerned. The Committee on Appropriations can have no knowledge as to whether there are going to be great floods on the Colorado River between the 1st of July, 1915, and the 30th of June, 1916. Certainly the Weather Bureau could not give them advance information on this subject. Perhaps they have consulted some weather prophet, who told them that a dry year is now due.

The levee work, as I have said, must be done. It is best done, according to the testimony of the engineers, during the time of flood; that is to say, when the river is high and the banks are caving. If rock revetment work is done at that time, it serves a better purpose than if done when the river is low. There is a flood on the Colorado River every year in June. The crest of the flood comes between the 10th and the last day of that month. Some years it is higher than others, but the flood is so sure to come that levees are absolutely necessary if the bottom lands are to be protected from overflow. I can not understand how the committee could arrive at the conclusion that the appropriation was needed as a mere insurance against unusual conditions.

Neither do I understand about this 7-foot lowering of the bed of the Colorado River at Yuma. I know that when the Colorado River broke into the Imperial Valley the flow of the current was greatly increased, the river did wash back, and the bed was lowered for a time at Yuma. Since the river has been prevented from flowing into the Imperial Valley, however, the river bed has returned to its old level, and I understand that the situation there is just about the same as it was before the original break occurred.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. HAYDEN. I shall be glad to hear further from the gentleman about this matter.

Mr. MONDELL. The committee reduced this item, as I stated the other day, for various reasons. First we were assured by the service that all the estimates were liberal, and the hearings bear out that fact. Second, there is some doubt as to whether all of this rock-revetment work will ever be needed. It is true that it will be wise eventually to revet the toes of all of these levees, and to complete the levee system, on which nearly a million dollars has already been spent; but the height to which the rock revetment must be carried depends, of course, upon the height to which the river will rise or is likely to rise. Now, the probability is that the river under normal conditions, before the change of channel, would not have risen sufficiently to require as large an expenditure for rock revetment as has been estimated. But there has been a permanent lowering in the channel of the Colorado. The gentleman will recall that the old channel of the Colorado was the very highest territory in the valley. The river had gradually deposited its silt along its channel, and its bed had gradually risen until it was occupying territory higher than the lands on either side. Then the break came and the waters flowed over into the Alamo and toward the Imperial Valley. That break was finally closed, but the river was never forced back into its old channel. It was forced down into what I think is called the Bee River Channel and into Volcano Lake. Now, that entire stretch, down the Bee River and through Volcano Lake and into the Gulf, is considerably lower than the old channel of the river; and while it is true that there is not the same lowering of the channel of the river that there was when the break cut through and the water was running into the Alamo and down into the Sink, there is a permanent reduction of the level by reason of the change of the channel from the old bed into the Bee River and into Volcano Lake and down into the Gulf. Gen. Marshall put that lowering at about 7 feet.

Now, as I said at the beginning, this was at first a high estimate, admittedly so, Second, in the highest flood time under the old conditions, it was doubtful if as large a sum as this could be used in one year, because this rock-revetment work can best be done when the river is high, and can not be economically done except in the high or intermediate stages of the river. It was largely insurance against the utmost possibilities, under conditions of water level that do not now exist. We did not believe that it was wise to have several hundred thousand dollars apportioned to a project and taken from the fund to be held as a sort of insurance against possibilities, because all these sums may be used interchangeably for any of this work, and with the reduction we have made there is still a large amount available for this levee work.

Then, in addition to that, the whole reclamation fund, or all of the appropriations made in this bill, can be drawn upon if necessary for this work, if the necessity of it shall become apparent during the year.

Mr. HAYDEN. As I understand it, only to the extent of 10 per cent of the appropriation for a particular project.

Mr. MONDELL. I think that is true. I do not know but what we might wisely make it 20 per cent; but at any rate 10 per cent of the amount for this project. Taking all these things into consideration, the fact that the estimate was high to begin with, and the fact that even then it was largely with a view to having a provision for every possible contingency; that it was made largely with a view to old river conditions; that the entire sum is available for this purpose if it should be needed; that you can draw 10 per cent more from the other projects if you need it—in view of these facts, it did not seem to be wise to take this sum and segregate it for a purpose for which it would not be needed.

Mr. HAYDEN. I have read the hearings carefully and I did not find anything in them to the effect that the Reclamation Service has made very liberal estimates.

Mr. MONDELL. During the hearings Mr. Ryan said that the estimates were all liberal—not especially for this project, but that they were all liberal.

Mr. HAYDEN. I might say for the information of the gentleman that I know that on this project the United States Reclamation Service has built a railroad along the bank of the river so as to make it possible to do the revetment work and complete the levees. That railroad line has recently been completed, so that the Reclamation Service is in a position to use all the money they can get for that work. It is not a question of inability to expend this appropriation during any high-water season.

Mr. MONDELL. That is true; they could organize a force great enough to use all this money in rock revetment on that project this year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman must understand that his people must pay for this expenditure. It is not to their interest to have work done that is not needed.

Mr. HAYDEN. Neither is it to their interest to have the work extended over a long period of time with large overhead charges.

Mr. MONDELL. The overhead charges would not be greatly affected by this. My own opinion is—and I think I am pretty familiar with the Colorado River situation, for I have followed it pretty carefully from the time, some 14 years ago, when the Imperial Valley people were first trying to get their right of way—we have already spent a million dollars on this levee system, the building of which was not anticipated at the time we undertook the project. It is an awful burden there now. We ought not to take any chances of losing any part of it. But at the same time it is not wise to spend more money in rock-revetment work than is actually needed.

I am of the opinion that the reclamation people are not fearful the levees are going to be washed away if they do not use all this sum. They could spend a great deal of money and carry the rock revetment to the top of the levee. But if it is true, as Gen. Marshall told us—and he is about the best living authority on the subject—that the Colorado is permanently 7 feet lower than before, we would have built 7 feet of rock revetment on that project at a very great unnecessary cost, which the people of the project would have to pay.

I want to suggest to the gentleman that this is a little different from river and harbor appropriations. His constituents are expected some day to reimburse Uncle Sam for all the work, and while I do not suggest that in cutting down the estimate, the committee is trying to discourage the Reclamation Service from doing unnecessary work, if the failure to appropriate all the sums that they might possibly use would have the effect of keeping their expenditure within what is necessary, the gainers would be the constituents of my friend from Arizona. They would be the people that would gain, and they can not lose, because no one has suggested that there is an emergency existing here which necessitates the putting in of all of the rock revetment at once, and there is grave doubt whether it will ever be all needed.

Mr. HAYDEN. Doubt may exist in the mind of the gentleman from Wyoming, but not in the minds of the people at Yuma.

Mr. MONDELL. It exists in the minds of the reclamation people, in my opinion.

Mr. HAYDEN. I do not find any such thing in the hearings.

Mr. MONDELL. I think there are a number of things that were said during the hearings on the reclamation items that gentlemen may not find in the printed hearings. I do not know who is responsible for that, but I have a very lively recollection of what was said and I discussed this matter with gentlemen of the Reclamation Service, and I know, and I am confident that in the hearings it was stated, whatever the printed hearings may show on that point, that this was in the nature of an insurance or a considerable part of it, and that there was no certainty that it would all be needed.

Now, it is not in the interest of my friend's constituents that we shall encourage the service to build up the rock revetment above any possible rise in the river. On the contrary, we have given enough so that there is no danger of the work going out, no danger of any injury being done. A little more than $152,000 will remain for this purpose, assuming that all of the reduction is taken out of flood protection. If a little more is necessary there is the 10 per cent available, and the whole sum is available for any particular feature if needed. I have not the slightest idea that the service ought to spend, in the interest of that project, more than the amount suggested, $150,000, on the rock revetment and extension of the dikes this year.

Now, one word more. I think the gentleman realizes that the committee in passing on these items did not intend to limit or restrict or reduce any of these items in the way that by any possibility could work a real injury to a project. In only one case, which may be referred to later, was our reduction with the idea that the work contemplated by the service might not be needed for the next two or three years. Reductions were generally made with the idea that all the work which the service contemplated and which the service would perform during the year could be carried out and performed for the sums which were approved.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the committee came to the conclusion that there was some doubt as to the ultimate necessity for this expenditure. The appropriation is very largely for flood protection. There is some question whether the project will ever pay if the money to be expended for flood protection is charged against the project. There was some uncertainty as to the necessity for building these dikes and the emplacement of a rock revetment. Already, I think, $1,000,000 have been expended for that work, and if all is done that was originally contemplated, about $2,000,000 will be expended. That is a very considerable sum of money to be charged against the land. I want to say to the gentleman from Arizona that in recommending this reduction it was not with the idea of in any way interfering with the project, but it was in the belief that perhaps the work originally contemplated would not necessarily be required. To that extent, of course, those interested in the project would rejoice. No one wishes more expended upon it than possible.

Mr. HAYDEN. That is perfectly true.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And there being some doubt as to whether it would be necessary, with the additional information acquired in connection with an investigation conducted relative to the item that was inserted in the bill for the protection of Imperial Valley, the committee believed that it could safely reduce the amount recommended by $200,000. If it should happen that when Congress convenes in December, with further information in the hands of the Reclamation Service, it is apparent that beyond any question this particular work should be done within the fiscal year, then, so far as I am concerned, I would be very glad to unite, as I have no doubt from time to time it will be necessary to do, with others to make provision for additional sums for some of these projects that are recommended.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, of course I do not ask for a cent to be expended on the Yuma project that is not necessary, because it must all ultimately come out of the pockets of the farmers there; but I do think that, as their Representative, I ought to do everything within my power to see that sufficient funds are provided to take care of any emergency that may arise. I believe that I would be derelict in my duty if I do not make an effort to obtain at least as much of an appropriation as the amount named in the department estimates.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arizona.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

North Platte project, Nebraska-Wyoming: For maintenance, operation, continuation of construction, and incidental operations (including $800,000 for the Fort Laramie unit), $1,140,000.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. My curiosity has been aroused in regard to this item because of the fact that there is a remarkable coincidence in connection with this appropriation in that it includes an item of $800,000 not originally estimated for by the department, the expenditure to be in the State of Wyoming, represented by the one gentleman on the committee who has a reclamation project in his district. I would like to have him explain how this $800,000 increase for Wyoming happened to be placed in the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, it came in a supplemental estimate. When it came in I inquired of the gentleman whether he had gone to the Reclamation Service and insisted on its being sent down, and I told him very bluntly that if the Reclamation Service had been coerced because of his position on the committee to send down an estimate not originally contemplated, I would do everything that I could to prevent an appropriation being made. We were assured, both by the gentleman himself and by the Reclamation Service, that it was purely an oversight. The estimate was $900,000, and from statements made before the committee we persuaded the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] that that was one of the items in which we could safely reduce the amount recommended, and we reduced the amount from $900,000 to $800,000.

Mr. HAYDEN. I have heard of bargain sales where they mark goods up to $5 in order to be able to make a cut to $4.89, when, in fact, the article was worth $4.50. I did not know but that this might be one of those bargains in the way of an appropriation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I inquired both from the gentleman from Wyoming and those connected with the Reclamation Service, and the assurance was given that the matter was purely an oversight in the submission of estimates, and was not due to the coercive powers of the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. HAYDEN. I have noticed that one of my projects has been cut $200,000, another project was reduced $100,000, and other cuts have been made that in all aggregate about $1,000,000. Now here comes along this increase of $800,000, which the reductions in the others would provide for.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Nine hundred thousand dollars were estimated for the Fort Laramie unit of the North Platte project, and that would still keep the estimates within the estimated amount in the reclamation fund in the next year.

Mr. HAYDEN. Very easily, because enough is deducted from the other projects to make up that amount.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; without those reductions. The result of the reductions is this, that if the estimates of the revenue are accurate, there will be in the reclamation fund next year $1,000,000 in excess of what it is proposed to expend; and at the next session of Congress, if any situation should arise where Congress would agree it is imperative that a very considerable sum of money should be provided for some project not provided for, there would not be any fear or doubt as to the availability of the fund to meet the estimate. I think that is an important thing for those interested in the project—to have a situation where they would not have any doubt about getting the means.

Mr. HAYDEN. If this additional appropriation of $800,000 had not been made for use in Wyoming, we would have that amount of money in addition to be used in case of emergency.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, under date of December 7, the Secretary of the Interior transmitted the estimate referred to. I have his letter, which I will read:

DECEMBER 7, 1914.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

SIR: There is transmitted to you herewith supplemental estimate for the North Platte project to the amount of $900,000, which sum is estimated to be an imperative necessity for continuing the work on the Fort Laramie unit thereof. This amount is requested as an appropriation in addition to the sum of $348,000 included in the Book of Estimates for the North Platte project for the fiscal year 1916.

The necessity for submitting such supplemental estimate is that the law requiring such annual estimates to be submitted to the Treasury on or before October 15, was not approved until August 13, 1914, and within the limited time permitted in which to prepare such estimates the status of the Fort Laramie unit could not be accurately determined; therefore no amount was included on account of this unit.

It is now desired to supply this omission by a supplemental estimate to the amount of $900,000 for expenditure on the Fort Laramie unit of the North Platte project.

It is therefore requested that there shall be submitted to Congress the accompanying supplemental estimate of appropriation required for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, by the Reclamation Service for the Fort Laramie unit of the North Platte project in Nebraska and Wyoming the sum of $900.000.

This supplemental estimate has received the approval of the President.

Cordially, yours, FRANKLIN K. LANE.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Klamath project, Oregon-California: For maintenance, operation, continuation of construction, and incidental operations, $317,000.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 104, after line 18, by inserting the following paragraph:

"For Oregon projects to be designated by the Secretary of the Interior, $450,000."

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment is to restore the estimate that the Secretary of the Interior made in a supplemental recommendation to the committee. The committee, I understand, rejected this proposal for the reason that no project was designated by the Secretary of the Interior. I informed the Secretary that the committee would disapprove of this recommendation unless he designated the projects on which to expend this money. The Secretary immediately endeavored to have the service designate a project for the expenditure of $450,000, but he was unable to do this when the committee adjourned its hearings, as his engineers' reports were not finished. He is endeavoring to do that now; he is endeavoring to make a designation in time for the Senate committee to act if Congress insists on a designation. If the Secretary is compelled to make a designation in time for Congress to act, he will necessarily have to confine his designation to certain sections of the State from which he has final reports. This amendment will afford the Secretary ample time to examine the merits of various pojects. The State of Oregon has appropriated $50,000 in one instance and $15,000 in another for the purpose of investigating the various reclamation projects and possibilities of the State. The Secretary wrote to me that his final reports would be complete some time in June. Now, if he is compelled to designate a project at this time his investigation will be confined to certain sections of the State. I think that his investigation should be permitted to cover the entire State and let him secure the best project obtainable. It is well recognized by everyone who has examined into the distribution of the reclamation fund that the State of Oregon has been grossly discriminated against. No one has recognized that more keenly than the present Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Lane, and he is endeavoring, as far as it lies in his power, to remedy that discrimination and to accord the State its share of the reclamation fund.

Year before last the Secretary of the Interior, Mr. Lane, made a trip to Oregon and a trip into the arid sections of the State and publicly and privately he promised the people of Oregon that he would do everything in his power to secure to them a fair and equitable distribution of the reclamation fund. I think the Secretary is doing everything in his power to secure to the State an equitable distribution of the fund which he thinks the State is entitled to, and for that reason he put in this recommendation to the committee. Now, there will be a balance in the reclamation fund after all these appropriations are made of $1,394,000. The fund will not in any way be embarrassed or handicapped or jeopardized by the small additional allowance of $450,000 to the State of Oregon to be spent on a project to be hereafter designated by the Secretary of the Interior. The fact that Secretary Lane will have the expenditure of this $450,000 I think will give the assurance that it will be wisely and economically spent. In addition to that the Secretary himself will not be permitted to expend this $450,000 until he designates a project which will be approved by the President of the United States, and I think for these reasons that the fund will not be in any way endangered should the committee consent to this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the attention of the committee to the way the reclamation funds have been heretofore expended, and in doing so I do not do it for the purpose of making any invidious comparison between the expenditure of the funds in my State, the allotment of the funds to Oregon, and the allotments which other States have secured, but to show that we are not making an unreasonable request.

Now this present bill appropriates for the State of Arizona $1,315,000. The State of Arizona has contributed to the reclamation fund $1,241,696.83. The State of Arizona has heretofore secured from the reclamation fund $17,608,015.62. The State of Arizona has heretofore secured from the reclamation fund 1,348 per cent of the moneys which she put into the reclamation fund. The State of Colorado secures by this bill $1,171,000. The State of Colorado has put into the reclamation fund $6,957,991.83 and has secured from the reclamation fund the sum of $9,065,688.75. Idaho secures by this bill $2,060,000. Idaho put into the reclamation fund $5,212,408.90, and Idaho has heretofore secured $17,956,894.92. With the fund which Idaho will get by virtue of the present bill it will have secured $20,000,000 from the reclamation fund, having put therein a little over $5,000,000. Montana secures by this bill $2,420,000. Montana put into the reclamation fund $9,565,107.48 and has heretofore secured $11,295,788.40. The States of Nebraska and Wyoming secure in this bill $1,618,000. Nebraska has put into the fund $1,759,613.83 and Wyoming $4,522,900.46. Nebraska has heretofore secured $5,602,377.01 and Wyoming $7,377,899.38. The State of Washington gets out of this bill $1,301,000 and it has put in $6,555,299.73 and has secured heretofore $9,131,392.97 from this fund. Now the State of Oregon has contributed to the reclamation fund $10,550,928.22. It has received in gross only $5,644,530.82, and in that amount of $5,644,530.82 there is improperly inserted an item of $450,000 heretofore debited to Oregon cooperation account.

The net investment which the State of Oregon has secured from the reclamation fund is $3,261,623.22, having contributed thereto $10,550,928.22. Arizona has secured, according to the April number of the Reclamation Record, 1,348 per cent of the moneys which she put into the reclamation fund; Nevada, 1,067 per cent; Idaho, 327 per cent; Nebraska, 308 per cent; Utah, 166 per cent; Wyoming, 159 per cent; Washington, 137 per cent; Colorado, 128 per cent; Montana, 113 per cent; New Mexico, 110 per cent; Oregon, only 53 per cent; the State of California, 52 per cent; South Dakota, 50 per cent; Kansas, 42 per cent; North Dakota, 19 per cent; and Oklahoma, 3 per cent.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has expired.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes longer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes longer. Is there objection?

Mr. BRYAN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I do not object to the gentleman's speaking, but can we not return to that lost art of suggesting a limit of 5 minutes or 10 minutes for debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto? I have not heard that for so long that it would really be refreshing to hear it again.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is no demand for time on this paragraph, as I understand it, except from the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. SINNOTT].

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oregon?

There was no objection.

Mr. SINNOTT. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to read to the committee a letter which I received from Secretary Lane of date January 8, 1915, when the Irrigation Committee was considering the reclamation bill, jurisdiction of which was afterwards given to the Appropriation Committee. He writes to me as follows:

Hon. NICHOLAS J. SINNOTT,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SINNOTT: The estimates of appropriations for the Reclamation Service for the fiscal year 1916, now being considered by your committee, contain the following item:

"For the Oregon cooperative work, Oregon (conditioned upon appropriation of an equal amount by the State of Oregon), $450,000."

This department and the State are making an investigation of the possibilities for irrigation in central Oregon through a joint board of engineers, whose final report as to the Deschutes projects should be submitted by the end of this month, but will be delayed until March as to the John Day projects, and until June as to the Malheur and Harney Valley projects.

Now, that is the reason why we would like to have this allotment of $450,000 in this way at the present time without being compelled to designate a project. The Secretary will not have his surveys and field reports completed on the John Day project until March, and on the Malheur and Harney Valley projects until June. If we do not secure this amount in this bill, the State of Oregon will probably be delayed another year or two before we get further reclamation funds or the Secretary will be restricted in his selection of a project. The Secretary goes on to say:

I realize that these, or more extended investigations, may disclose a situation that would warrant utilizing this appropriation for the development of a practicable project, at a reasonable cost per acre, that would materially benefit the State, and am therefore willing that the language which limits the expenditure to a cooperation dependent upon an equal appropriation by the Oregon Legislature be stricken out and the following substituted therefor:

"For Oregon: Projects to be designated by the Secretary of the Interior, $450,000."

In this form the appropriation would, as I understand it, be available for the carrying out of any new and practicable project in Oregon which could be built within such an appropriation or which could be built by cooperation with the State for such appropriation and the amount contributed by the State.

I will state to the committee that at the present time there is a bill pending before the Oregon Legislature, designed to levy a one-half mill tax on all property in the State for the purpose of securing reclamation funds to cooperate with the Government in reclamation work. The Secretary continues:

It is a matter of great regret to me that the effort to secure cooperation with Oregon along the line of Gov. West's proposal appears to have failed. (I inclose the correspondence on this subject.) It promised the institution of a joint method of using State and Government funds in the development of the West, for it would, I feel sure, have been adopted by other States. I believe that while there is so heavy a demand upon the reclamation fund for the completion of the projects already under way, that it is wisest not to adventure upon new undertakings unless upon a dollar-for-dollar cooperative basis. Nevertheless, I shall raise no objection to the allotment of this amount to Oregon, for I am well convinced that in the past too little consideration has been given to her needs and to the opportunities for development in that State, which I attempted somewhat to remedy by the extension of the Umatilla project and the effort to meet the suggestion as to cooperation in the Deschutes Valley.

Cordially, yours, FRANKLIN K. LANE.

I desire to add, Mr. Chairman, that the State of Oregon has done what no other State in the Union has done. It has appropriated and expended on reclamation projects the sum of $450,000 in one instance. It has also appropriated $50,000 to cooperate with the Government in making surveys, and has made another appropriation for that purpose of $15,000.

With this history in mind of the interest which Oregon has manifested in the reclamation of arid lands, and the niggardly treatment accorded it in the distribution of the reclamation funds, it seems to me that we are not asking too much when we ask you to approve of the recommendation of Secretary Lane, that Oregon be allotted another item of $450,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oregon has expired.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting the table of receipts, allotments, and investments, as found on page 218 of the hearings for the Reclamation Service.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks, as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The table referred to follows.

RECEIPTS, ALLOTMENTS, AND INVESTMENT BY STATES.

The table following gives a statement of additions to the reclamation fund from the sale of public lands, by States, and also shows the amounts allotted and the net investment of the Government for irrigation work in each of the reclamation States:

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the committee did not recommend this appropriation. To do so would be to initiate a policy which, in my opinion, could not be too severely condemned.

This is a request, in a case where specific appropriations are being made for the first time, to confer upon the Secretary of the Interior blanket authority to designate any project and an appropriation to be expended upon it. The Secretary of the Interior might designate a project that would eventually involve an expenditure of many millions of dollars, and, having commenced it, the excuse would be that having expended half a million dollars on the project we could not justify a discontinuance of the work.

The moneys carried on this bill for reclamation projects are to carry on work on projects already under construction. There has been expended heretofore on reclamation projects $115,000,000, if my recollection is correct, and it is estimated that these projects will take about $51,000,000 to complete. It seems unreasonable to ask Congress to appropriate money to be expended on a project unknown at this time to anyone, not designated, not selected, and with no knowledge of what the ultimate expenditure on account of the project might be.

It seems to me that before any money is appropriated for reclamation projects hereafter a project should be definitely designated and accurate information furnished as to the land to be irrigated, a careful estimate made of the cost of the work, a limit placed upon the cost of the project, and then the appropriations made to carry on the work thus authorized. If such a system as that be adopted, it will eliminate much of the criticism of these projects.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I have been informed that the Government has a great deal of land under ditches that are completed, and that it is almost impossible in many instances to dispose of the land that is now under ditches and would be capable of being irrigated—that the Government is unable to find purchasers or persons to take the land. Has the gentleman any information upon that? Have they furnished him any information as to the disposal of land that is already irrigated?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Some projects have not been taken up as rapidly as was anticipated. Some of them, of course, are costing much more than was believed at the outset, but we have projects under construction which will require about $51,000,000 to complete. It seemed to the committee desirable to dedicate the proceeds of the reclamation fund to the completion of these projects, particularly as the estimates submitted relative to the so-called Oregon cooperative work were for projects to be determined on hereafter, and projects of which it will be impossible to tell how much the eventual cost will be.

I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much time does the gentleman wish?

Mr. MONDELL. About five minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask unanimous consent that the debate on the pending amendment and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that debate on the pending amendment and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the subcommittee on this bill and of the Committee on Appropriations, I would have been very glad, indeed, had I been able to support the estimates proposed by the Secretary for a project in Oregon. I could not do so for various reasons. First, it presented the question of a new project. That in itself was a question that the committee would have considered carefully. Beyond that it raised the question of a new project, the size and character of which no man knew or could suggest. I am sure that my friend from Oregon realizes that this committee could hardly take the responsibility of making an appropriation for a project which we have never seen, a project which we knew nothing about, which might cost ultimately $1,000,000 or $10,000,000 or $20,000,000. We could not afford to take the chances of loading that sort of a project on the reclamation fund.

It is true that Oregon has contributed largely to the fund, and should for that reason be given proper consideration for a project. But Oregon has had more in proportion to what she has contributed than North or South Dakota or Oklahoma. Oregon is only partly an arid State. Half of the State or more is humid and does not need irrigation. Some gentleman reminds me, however, that the entire State has recently gone dry. [Laughter.]

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. SINNOTT. I will say that about two-thirds of the State consists of what are called arid lands suitable for irrigation. There are many feasible irrigation projects in Oregon, as I understand it.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think Oregon has as many feasible projects as some of the other States. Otherwise it would not have taken the Reclamation Service so long to have found a feasible project in Oregon.

Mr. NORTON and Mr. MARTIN rose.

Mr. MONDELL. I am sure that the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. NORTON] and the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. MARTIN], on either side of me, could suggest a suitable project in either State, offhand, in a moment.

Mr. NORTON. We have several of them.

Mr. SINNOTT. The Director of the Reclamation Service, before your committee, commented upon the great number of feasible projects in the State of Oregon and laid particular stress upon them.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not recall that part of his testimony.

Mr. MARTIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN. In this connection I should like to remind the gentleman that in the State of South Dakota there is a project of such merit that it has had an appropriation from the State legislature, and the State engineering force has surveyed it and gone into all details and has furnished the Secretary of the Interior with a detailed estimate of the number of acres and the cost per acre, and those details have been before the department now for about a year. The State has gone to the expense of several thousand dollars and done this preliminary work, and it is only waiting for the starting of a new project.

Mr. MONDELL. What the gentleman from South Dakota intends to say is that they have discovered a little more water flowing out of Wyoming that is not appropriated, and they are asking for the construction of another reclamation project with that Wyoming water.

Mr. MARTIN. They have little use for water in Wyoming, as I can testify. [Laughter.]

Mr. SINNOTT. In view of the fact that the allotment to the gentleman's State and to Nebraska has been increased nearly $800,000 more than the original estimates of the Secretary, does the gentleman still object to this little amount of $450,000?

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman must not base his request for appropriations on misstatements of fact. There have been no increases in the item over what the Secretary originally proposed for that Wyoming-Nebraska project, unless the Secretary himself is in error in the statement he makes in submitting the supplemental estimates when he called attention to the fact that the failure to submit the item in the original estimates was an oversight.

It should be borne in mind that the reclamation fund is rapidly dwindling. We shall have a hard time completing the projects already undertaken. I question if we should undertake any new projects.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SINNOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I would if I had any more time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, if I could bring myself to the viewpoint that is held by most of the gentlemen representing semiarid States, I might find myself more in sympathy with the motion of the gentleman from Oregon. But, unfortunately, to my mind, their position is totally untenable. I do not believe that we can afford to spend reclamation funds on the theory of distributing them between various States without regard to the needs of doing reclamation work in those States. This committee would have been subject to very severe censure if it had undertaken to appropriate a sum without knowing what it was to be expended for or where, other than it was to be expended in a given State. I have taken occasion repeatedly to say on the floor what I desire to now repeat, that I do not think the public lands of America belong to the States in which they happen to be situated. They belong to the people of America and all of the people of America, and the most of the abuse that has grown up regarding the expenditure of this fund has grown up because of the pernicious idea that the people in a particular locality had a special claim or ownership in all the fund that might arise from the sale of public lands in that locality. Hence there has always been a pressure to spend money there, whether it ought to be spent there or not and whether there was any project fit for the spending of the money there.

Speaking for myself, I repeat that if we are going to have this distributed on the theory of the gentlemen from the West, then the gentleman from Oregon has some right to complain. He has a right to feel that the other people have hogged more than their share; but I feel that the National Government can not afford to treat the reclamation fund with any such idea at all.

We ought not to undertake new projects without knowing what they are and what we are going into.

One curious thing about these reclamation projects is that the only project finished happens to be one that has proved an absolute failure. There is one project that has been completed, and it was discovered that the reservoir would not hold water, and no amount of work can make it hold water; and the most of the funds put into the project have been sunk and lost forever.

So I submit in candor to this committee that we can not afford to undertake new projects without knowing what they are, what we are going into, and something about what the expenditure will be.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does the gentleman allude to the Hondo project?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes. I am sure that whenever the report comes in from the Secretary of the Interior to Congress if there is a project for Oregon it will be dealt with by the committee with the utmost liberality and fairness; but to ask us now to make an appropriation without knowing where it is to be spent and what it is to lead to, or the character of the project, is to ask us to do what no good business man would do in his private affairs and what no good official would do in public affairs.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman tell us how much was spent on the Hondo project?

Mr. SHERLEY. I can not tell the gentleman exactly, but quite a considerable sum; something over $300,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired; all time has expired.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to vacate the order just made and that he may address the committee for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Chairman, I understand that the Secretary at the present time has an Oregon project, the approval of which he is considering, and which has been approved by the Reclamation Service, but that he desires, if possible, to await the final reports on the John Day, Malheur, and Harney Valley projects, which will be completed in June. My amendment will allow him time to consider all these projects. They are all projects that I believe he will approve of.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman will recognize that the Secretary of the Interior has that power now, and that there are $50,000 appropriated in this bill.

Mr. SINNOTT. Yes; and the State of Oregon has given him $50,000 to make these surveys.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon.

The question was taken, and the amendment was lost.

The Clerk read as follows:

Belle Fourche project, South Dakota: For maintenance, operation, continuation of construction, and incidental operations, $144,000.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I was somewhat aroused and interested by the concluding remarks of the gentelman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY]. I fully agree with him that the money derived from the sale of public lands belongs to all the people of the country, and that it was a mistake to insert in the original reclamation law a provision requiring in a mandatory way that some project be begun in every one of the public-land States regardless of the physical demands of the locality, and that the money should be apportioned between public-land States regardless of the needs of projects under construction. That particular feature of the law which proved so objectionable and unworkable was amended and repealed, as the chairman of the committee has just called to my attention.

Mr. SMITH of Texas. The original act provided that the major part of the money raised from the sale of public lands should be used in that State, but that was repealed by the act of June 25, 1910.

Mr. BORLAND. Then I am right in saying that it was repealed. I have always believed as a western man that the highest value the public lands had to the Nation and to the people of the Nation, including the people of the older States, was to provide for a prompt settlement of these lands by American citizens; that they were not an asset that should be held out of the market to secure a rise in price, but that the minute they got into the hands of a bona fide settler and the settler became a taxpaying, producing citizen that was an asset far greater than any possible advance in any price of the land.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Nothing I have said contravenes that viewpoint at all.

Mr. BORLAND. I got the impression that the gentleman believed that this money belonged to the Nation at large.

Mr. SHERLEY. I think it does.

Mr. BORLAND. And that, therefore, it was not necessarily proper to be appropriated for the development of western land.

Mr. SHERLEY. I am perfectly willing to develop, if we are developing for a national purpose, but whenever you get the idea that the particular public land has impressed upon it a State right as against a national right, then you have an inducement to undertake things that can not be justified from the standpoint of making homes for Americans, or any other good reason.

Mr. BORLAND. I am not sure yet but that there is a fundamental difference of opinion between myself and the gentleman. I believe that the public lands in Colorado or Wyoming or California are of more importance to people of those States than they are to the people of other States, and I believe that their importance consists in getting bona fide tax-paying citizens there at the earliest possible moment, and that is the true development and the true use of the public lands. The question of whether we shall appropriate the proceeds of these lands for particular forms of internal development is a matter for the wisdom of Congress. The question of whether we ought to divide it equally among the States is a comparatively crude way of getting at it, but it is wisely used in the last analysis if it is used for the development of the internal resources of the public-land States. If the plan succeeds, as it is hoped it will succeed, in opening those arid and semiarid lands to settlement and to a tax-paying, producing population, then, in my judgment, that is the highest use that can be made of them. I have objected to starting this proposition out of the public-land fund and then saddling it upon the General Treasury of the Government. I do not believe that ought to be done. I think that the General Treasury of the Government ought not to have been invaded by that alleged $20,000,000 bond issue that was never made. It was done under the information—misleading information, I believe—given to Congress that the $20,000,000 bond issue, if authorized by Congress, would complete these projects, and that it would be rapidly paid back by settlements of projects. That expectation could not have been well founded even at the time it was made. I believe we are on the right track in confining these improvements to the fund originally set apart for that purpose. I believe as to that fund no wiser use can be made.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not quarrel with what the gentleman has said, but I can in a moment call his attention to the distinction between the western State view touching public land and the view that I have. It might be highly desirable for the Nation to preserve as national forests certain of its public lands, but you find the States objecting, because, according to their views, it takes away a certain amount of taxable property, and a certain amount of land which they think could be better used in making homes for people in the State and building up their population. In the determination of that question I believe in the national viewpoint, and that simply what may be to the interest of the State in which the land lies ought not to be the controlling factor.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I believe that primarily public lands——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MONDELL. I thought the time had all been consumed on this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. No. The committee has disposed of the section on which debate was limited, and this is the following section. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I believe the primary use of public land is to get settlers on it, and if under any view public lands are devoted to some other purpose, national forest or park or otherwise, it ought to be upon some showing that there is an overriding national necessity for withdrawing those lands from the ordinary normal uses of settlement. Right there comes a clear-cut division between the uses for national purposes represented by various services and the use for what might be called State purposes. My view is, and possibly I do not differ from the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] in the last analysis, that the primary and normal purpose of public land is for settlement by citizens, and that any other use of them is an extraordinary use that must be justified by the facts that support it. It may be it is true, and I have no doubt there are cases where land ought to be withdrawn for forest purposes and probably so withdrawn and so withheld from settlement for water-power purposes and national-park purposes and possibly for other purposes that may be discovered and developed, possibly for some mineral-research development that may come about later, but I claim that that is unusual and that the other is usual.

To get back to this proposition, the amount received from public land has, in my judgment, been largely augmented by these reclamation projects. In fact, I doubt if the public lands would have produced as much in the last 10 years if these projects had not been begun. We have almost reached the point where new public lands had stopped selling to bona fide settlers, so we can not say that if those projects were not begun we would have all this money in the Public Treasury. It is very probable that we would not. A great deal of it would not have gone into the Public Treasury. Nevertheless it is just as important for the Members of this House from the reclamation States as it is for those from the other States to see to it that the reclamation plans and projects do not become a burden on the Federal Treasury. Their development is, to a certain extent, local in the immediate benefits, and they ought to be confined, and strictly so, to the fund set apart for that purpose.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] is in error somewhat regarding the representations made at the time Congress authorized the $20,000,000 bonded indebtedness. I was present and took part in those hearings and debates. I was present, I think, at nearly all of them. The claim made at that time was that if $30,000,000 was allowed a number of the projects would be practically completed, and the Government would that much sooner be in a position of receiving a return of the funds. In fact, they started out to ask for $40,000,000, but they always felt they were entitled to have $30,000,000. That was cut down by the House. As I recollect it, the Senate was willing to give us $30,000,000, but the House cut it to $20,000,000.

Now, nobody ever claimed $20,000,000 would complete all the reclamation projects; but it was insisted at the time, and has been ever since, that the $20,000,000 will be paid back to the Government, every dollar of it. There is no disposition anywhere to have that $20,000,000 lost to the Treasury of the United States. As a matter of fact, the western projects are going to pay back all of this money and Uncle Sam is not going to lose one dollar of it. The only trouble now is that the overhead charges are becoming so great and the expenses of construction are becoming so high that it is a great burden upon many of the people who are located under those projects. They expected originally to get title to their lands for $20 or $30 an acre, while now it is going to cost them $80 an acre and in some places higher. They are not getting land and money for nothing, as some people apparently imagine.

Mr. CLINE. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will.
Mr. CLINE. Is there any indication when these projects will begin to pay back any money to the Federal Government?
Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Some of them are repaying the Government now.
Mr. CLINE. Some amounts have already been paid back?
Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes.
Mr. CLINE. What amount?
Mr. BORLAND. Approximately $4,000,000 on an investment of over $90,000,000.
Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. They are only just beginning to repay the Government. I think they have done pretty well to have already repaid $4,000,000.
Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Certainly.
Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. I was one of the western Members who favored changing the law, so that appropriations for this reclamation project should be shown in the estimates annually.
Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes, sir.
Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman from Colorado, with most of the Representatives from the reclamation States, took a different view of it. Does not the gentleman think if that practice had obtained since we began these projects that these overhead charges and these excessive expenses, that he says are now a burden upon the settler, would have been very much less?
Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, I think that is true, but I think these excessive charges and the illy considered expenditures are now very largely stopped. I am not complaining of the present management.
Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman does not think that the action of the last session of Congress in requiring these appropriations to be estimated for and made annually is going to injure the development under the Reclamation Service?
Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; I do not think so. I do not think it will injure the development. I think the chances are it will have a tendency to improve its efficiency. I was one who did not wish to see the Committee on Appropriations have jurisdiction of it, because I felt that they had so many other things to do they could not give these projects the attention that the Irrigation Committee could; but notwithstanding I am not criticizing that committee's action on this bill at all. A careful supervision of these expenditures is undoubtedly going to work beneficially. But I did not want the impression to get out that we obtained this money under false pretenses, or that we ever said or expected $20,000,000 to complete 32 projects that are going to cost possibly $75,000,000.
Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will.
Mr. BORLAND. Now, the gentleman says he did not expect $20,000,000 would complete these projects. Did the gentleman expect $40,000,000 would complete them?
Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; we did not promise that $40,000,000 would complete them, but it was said that that amount would put them in shape where Uncle Sam would commence getting his money back.
Mr. BORLAND. Then, to go further, long before they could expect to get the $20,000,000 back, did not they begin a second project in Colorado? Did not the then Secretary of the Interior, after getting the original $20,000,000——
Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; Secretary Garfield started that project, and Secretary Ballinger was working on that project long before that bond issue. That has been established some 8 or 10 years.
Mr. BORLAND. That is the Grand Valley project. That was not authorized until after the $20,000,000 had been issued. It was not authorized——
Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Yes; there had been something like $100,000 spent on it in surveys and otherwise at that time.
Mr. BORLAND. But the fact was the Secretary of the Interior had never authorized a contract until after the $20,000,000——
Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. There had been surveys and locations and other work done——
Mr. BORLAND. The dates will show.
Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. There have been several surveys made and considerable money spent by the Interior Department.
Mr. BORLAND. That project is a large project—ten or eleven million dollars.
Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. No; not half that much, but a good one. President Taft said it was the best project of all of them.
The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

No new drainage system shall be undertaken by the Reclamation Service unless and until valid and binding agreement to repay the cost thereof shall be entered into by a majority of the landowners designated by the Secretary of the Interior as equitably chargeable therewith.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.
The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.
The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "service," in line 2, page 106, insert:
"On a project or unit on which the construction charge per acre has been fixed and which system shall increase the cost per acre above the sum so fixed."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the item to which I offer the amendment was inserted with a view of preventing the service from undertaking any new drainage system that would increase the cost of the project above the price fixed. This may be necessary in order that work of this class shall not be undertaken unless it will be reimbursable, but the language as it is in the bill does not clearly indicate the intent of the committee in my opinion. I believe the words I have suggested are necessary to make the intent of the committee clear.
Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me ask the gentleman from Wyoming. Take a case where a project has not been opened and the cost per acre has not been fixed, and there is a controversy as to whether there has not been a determination of the project's cost.
Mr. MONDELL. Well, the gentleman from New York understands that under the law as it is now, under the new legislation, no project will be opened until the price is fixed, and up to the time when the project is opened any lands under the project or the people on the project are subject to whatever charge may be fixed.
Mr. FITZGERALD. There is some controversy about that.
Mr. MONDELL. There have been controversies in the past as to whether the price per acre had been fixed, as to whether a project had been opened, as to whether the people had been notified what the price was to be, the people in some cases claiming that it was their understanding that the acre price had been fixed, and the service insisting that any statement made with regard to the construction charge was not the statement which the law contemplated as fixing the price per acre. There can be no question hereafter with regard to that matter, because a project can not be opened until the price has been fixed; and it seems to me that unless we adopt this provision the service could not carry on a drainage project the necessity of which developed during the period of construction or one which might be needed after opening, but would not increase the cost above the construction charge. Unless this language is added to the provision contained in the bill, I do not believe that the provision is workable.
Mr. FITZGERALD. I asked Mr. Davis to prepare a provision for consideration, and pointed out the situation that might exist. I said to him: "There is this question which arises as to whether such restriction should apply to the expenditure on drainage works that have not yet started, and as to whether the same restriction would be wise as to expenditures on work already under construction and on which maybe you have gone too far, and it would be wise to discontinue the scheme that you have started, regardless of whether the money is to be reimbursed or not." The reclamation officers submitted the draft that is in the bill providing that no new drainage system shall be undertaken.
Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will read a little further, he will see that their draft itself contemplates the situation that the language I offer makes clear. It says:

No new drainage system shall be undertaken until valid and binding agreements to pay the cost shall have been entered into by a majority of the landowners.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.
Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.
The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?
There was no objection.
Mr. MONDELL. Now, up to the time they are ready to open the project there is no way in which any such obligation can be accepted by the landowners.
But let me say this to the gentleman from New York: We are all interested in having this paragraph in exactly the form in which it should be. If the gentleman has any doubt about it, I have not. If the gentleman has any doubt about it, I am willing either to withdraw it or to return to the paragraph later and have the matter looked up in the meantime.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let us pass it over and permit the amendment to be pending.

Mr. MONDELL. Any arrangement of that kind will be satisfactory to me.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not certain about it. If the gentleman will agree to pass over the paragraph with the amendment pending, I am willing. The purpose was to frame a provision which would prevent settlers upon a project obtaining the benefits of an expenditure for drainage and resisting the reimbursement of the Government for that expenditure.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. HAYDEN. That can only occur where the total cost of the project prior to that time has been fixed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If you gentlemen all agree that this amendment is the one that puts the paragraph in the proper shape, I shall not object.

Mr. HAYDEN. I think the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] makes that clear, and ought to be adopted.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I wanted to ask a question about this. This provides, as it stands, that no new drainage system shall be entered upon unless a majority of the landowners enter into a binding agreement to pay the whole cost. Now, supposing there are a thousand owners and 501 of them enter into an agreement. Does that mean that the 501 have to pay the whole cost?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No. Under the act of last year these questions are submitted to a vote, and the majority can determine what shall bind all the settlers involved. In some of these drainage projects, however, drainage may be necessary on a project, and——

Mr. MANN. I know what is intended, but what I am trying to find out is what is covered by the language of the bill. The bill says that unless a majority enter into a valid and binding agreement to repay the whole cost, you can not enter upon the project. Now, this agreement must be some kind of an agreement—the language here is "a valid and binding agreement"—made by these people. I assume it is made in writing, and the majority will have to sign that agreement, and that majority will have to pay the whole cost. That is what the language says. The gentleman tries to overturn that by referring to the law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Under the law these matters are submitted to the persons affected. If the majority votes in favor of doing a certain thing, it binds everybody affected.

Mr. MANN. That is the existing law, but that is not this provision. Because that is not efficient or effective sufficiently in the gentleman's opinion he proposes this, which distinctly says that the majority who sign the agreement must agree to pay the whole cost.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Under the existing law——

Mr. MANN. I am merely calling it to the attention of the gentleman. I do not care.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The purpose is to make those affected pay the expense. The Reclamation Service drafted this provision, and said that under its language——

Mr. MANN. The fact that the Reclamation Service drafted it is no sign that it is correct.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They will enforce it in that way.

Mr. MANN. What they wanted to accomplish, I suppose, is that all should pay the cost of it; but what the language means is that the majority shall pay the cost.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It says, "An agreement made by a majority vote of those affected."

Mr. MANN. If that is the intent, why not say so, instead of saying the other thing?

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will allow me——

Mr. FITZGERALD. The suggestion of the gentleman has a good deal of merit, and I suggest that we pass the paragraph till to-morrow, and, in the meantime, work out the wording so that it will accomplish what is intended. I ask unanimous consent to pass the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the paragraph, with the pending amendment, be passed until the next meeting of the committee. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I want to say a word in regard to this question of increased cost, because that was one of the features of this new reclamation-extension law.

It was claimed originally as to most of these projects that an advance estimate had been given to the settlers as to how much the project was going to cost per acre, and that they had capitalized the water users' association upon that basis, and that that was what they were bound for. A controversy of considerable size existed between the settlers and the department on that very question. The department solved that problem in this way: The settlers in many cases wanted additional time on their payments, or they wanted an enlargement of their original projects, and when they came to the department to ask either an extension of time or relief from a default, or an extension, or new work, or any other favor, the department said to them, "Gentlemen, either you must agree to the increased cost over and above what you claim was the limit fixed by the department when the work was begun, or we will not do what you ask." In that way they compelled the settlers to agree to the real cost instead of the original estimate, which in all cases was too low and in some cases was only 50 per cent of the real cost.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BORLAND. As soon as I finish this statement. Now, that was the condition before the reclamation-extension law was passed, and the department was actually operating successfully under that system. But along came these gentlemen, and they asked Congress to extend their time by law to 20 annual payments and to relieve them from the first five years' payment.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Because we could not possibly pay it.

Mr. BORLAND. Surely, because they could not pay it; because the projects had in many cases exceeded the original estimate. They asked Congress to pass a law extending the limit of time. Then they asked Congress not only to take away from the department the latitude the department had of compelling them to live up to the real cost, but to say that no new projects or extensions of cost should be added to the cost of construction without the consent of the majority of the water users of the project. Now, that ties the hands of the department in several ways. In the first place, the settlers have got an extension of time. In the second place, they are the absolute masters of the situation as to when new work shall be begun. In that case they failed to say that drainage should be one of the items, and it turns out that in all of the projects no estimate was made for drainage in the original estimate of cost. It was all an afterthought, although they knew that it was a necessary feature of irrigation work and it must be made an integral part of the work. In order to do that under the law that you gentlemen have lately passed, the department must submit it to the majority of the water users to say when they want the drainage done.

Now, I think that the language in this bill ought to remain as it is. It is general language, it is true, but it would be limited by the amendment of the gentleman from Wyoming to a certain case, to wit, the case where the project had been formally opened and definite construction cost fixed. He would strike out and limit the action of the department from applying it to cases where the construction cost by reason of drainage had already exceeded the original estimate, but where no actual proclamation of opening had been made.

Mr. MONDELL. What would the gentleman do? Would he abandon the project?

Mr. BORLAND. The language of the law as it stands is sufficiently broad. It says that the new drainage shall not be begun unless and until a valid agreement is had for its repayment. If the valid agreement is in existence, as the gentleman said, if the original agreement would cover the work up to the time that the construction charge is fixed, then the gentleman's amendment is not needed.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will read the item carefully, he will see that the item as it stands will prevent the service from carrying on any one of their projects that they are now carrying on that have not been opened, where they have to do any drainage work. That would be the effect of it, because they are not dealing with the people in the matter of setting prices per acre, and they can not deal with them until they have got the price fixed.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that there has been a unanimous-consent agreement to pass the section until to-morrow, is not this debate out of order?

The CHAIRMAN. Under a strict construction of the rule the Chair would say yes, but the Chair and the committee have been proceeding with great leniency in regard to that rule. The time of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] has expired.

Mr. BORLAND. I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for two minutes, in order to reply to the gentleman from Wyoming.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that his time be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BORLAND. If the department undertook to put in a system of drainage against the opposition of the settlers, even though the project had not been formally opened, they would have the same old dispute with the settlers that they had before, but they would not have the same means of solving that dispute that they had before, to wit, the latitude to accept or refuse an extension of time. We have taken that latitude away from the department, and that was the club by which they settled the disputes of the settlers. They were all asking for an extension of time. The department gave the extension where necessary, but they gave it on such terms as would protect the department. I think the language, broad as it is, is probably needed. If the department recommends any reduction of it, that is another matter.

The Clerk read as follows:

PROTECTION OF LANDS AND PROPERTY IN THE IMPERIAL VALLEY, CAL.

For protecting lands and property in the Imperial Valley and elsewhere along the Colorado River, within the limits of the United States, against injury or destruction by reason of the changes in the channels of the Colorado River, and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to expend any portion of such money within the limits of the Republic of Mexico as he may deem proper in accordance with such agreements for the purpose as may be made with the Republic of Mexico, $100,000, no part of which sum shall be expended until there shall have been paid into the Treasury, by contributions from the Imperial Valley irrigation district, an equivalent amount to the credit of the Secretary of the Interior to constitute with the amount hereby appropriated the total sum of $200,000, to be expended by him for the purposes herein described.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. Does anyone know what the ultimate cost of this will be?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It may be that it will be necessary to expend at least a million dollars out there, but this is to take care of the immediate situation, and the representative of the settlers in the Imperial Valley stated that if Congress did what they were then requesting there would be no further request. I think the situation, from what I have heard indirectly, is worse than when the matter was before the committee.

Mr. MANN. How much have they already expended?

Mr. FITZGERALD. A million dollars.

Mr. MANN. How much did the Southern Pacific expend that they want the Government to reimburse them for?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think one million and a half.

Mr. MANN. So there is two and a half million dollars up to date. Does the gentleman mean to say that by spending $100,000 that ends it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Two hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. MANN. That is drawing on the imagination a long ways.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not think that this will permanently care for the situation, but this is to carry it past the great danger that threatens from floods this spring.

Mr. MANN. And probably next year they will need the same amount.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. In the statement that was made it was said that this would carry it along at least 10 years.

Mr. MANN. Who makes the statement? They send one man here one year and the next year they send another man, and he is not bound by what the first one said.

Mr. KETTNER. The statement was made by one of the commissioners of the irrigation district. The people of the Imperial Valley voted $3,500,000 to buy this irrigation system from what they term the C. D. Co., which was formerly owned by the Southern Pacific.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is reelected to the next House. Is he willing to say that he will not come and ask Congress to make any further appropriation while he is a Member of the House?

Mr. KETTNER. Why, Mr. Chairman, I would not like to make a statement of that kind.

Mr. MANN. I wondered if anybody would really get pinned down on it except some gentleman who is not going to be here next year.

Mr. KETTNER. The gentleman will admit that the people of the Imperial Valley are making progress. They have voted, as I say, $3,500,000 to buy this system.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from California knows all the circumstances; I do not. It was stated that $100,000 was all that would be asked of the Government for 10 years. Is the gentleman willing to make that statement?

Mr. KETTNER. No; I am not willing to make the statement for this reason——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not have to give any reason. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. That statement was not made to the committee. They said if we gave them $250,000 they would not ask for any more.

Mr. MANN. It is perfectly evident to my mind that any promises made that they would not ask for any more were Indian gifts and are to be withdrawn, or made with the fingers crossed. I want to ask the gentleman who in the Republic of Mexico now can give consent to this.

Mr. KETTNER. The Department of the Interior spent $50,000 last year on this same project in the Republic of Mexico, and the conditions are the same now as they were a year ago.

Mr. MANN. In Mexico? Not at all.

Mr. KETTNER. In fact, they are better now.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; they are much worse in Mexico.

Mr. KETTNER. Not in the Imperial Valley in Lower California.

Mr. MANN. No one knows now among the numerous governments in Mexico who has charge. I say no one; the gentleman may know; and if he does, will he tell us who will we deal with in the Republic of Mexico in reference to this matter?

Mr. KETTNER. The people of the Imperial Valley now are dealing with Gen. Villa. He has his governor appointed in Lower California. At the present time the people are dealing with him.

Mr. MANN. But Villa has not been acting as President more than 10 days.

Mr. KETTNER. He has had his governor there for some time.

Mr. MANN. Whom do you mean by "his governor"?

Mr. KETTNER. The man he appointed as governor.

Mr. MANN. But he has not been President but a short time.

Mr. KETTNER. He has taken that liberty, however.

Mr. MANN. Plainly that is not the Government of Mexico.

Mr. KETTNER. He is the only governor there is authorized in that section.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] propounds a very important interrogatory as to how much we will probably be called upon to spend in the future for the protection of Imperial Valley, and the gentleman from California [Mr. KETTNER] and others, individually and collectively, decline to make any promises. I do not blame them for refusing to make promises, but I think that the gentleman from California should not hereafter call upon the Federal Government to appropriate funds for the protection of the Imperial Valley. I feel very kindly toward the people of the Imperial Valley and southern California and think we should be very liberal with them; but I think they ought to understand that this is about all that Uncle Sam ought to be expected to do for them. So far as their trouble with the overflow of Volcano Lake is concerned, it is not a matter that directly concerns anybody but the people of the Imperial Valley.

There is, however, a real menace, the possibility of a break in the river in its upper reaches, the 8 miles below the headgate of the Imperial Canal, the possibility of its again breaking and running over into the Alamo, which is now used as the canal for the Imperial Valley Irrigation Works. Most of this hundred thousand dollars, I presume, will be expended in cooperation between the people of the Imperial Valley and the Government, although, of course, the Secretary of the Interior will use his judgment in the matter in strengthening the levees on the upper river. The care and the protection of the Imperial Valley from the overflow of Volcano Lake should be provided for entirely, I think, by the people of the Imperial Valley, and if $200,000 are expended on the upper river to strengthen the levees and to prevent the danger of the river again breaking through into the Alamo and into the Imperial Valley Canal I think it ought to put that work in such shape that we will not be called upon again to contribute anything in the future. After the expenditure of the sum herein provided for, I think the people of the Imperial Valley should take care of the river as it affects their valley.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 106, line 16, after the sum "$100,000," strike out all of line 16 and insert in lieu thereof the words "which sum shall be available for expenditure as soon as."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

ALASKA, EXPENSES IN.

Alaska Engineering Commission: For carrying out the provisions of the act approved March 12, 1914 (38 Stats., 305), entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to locate, construct, and operate railroads in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes," to continue available until expended, $2,000,000.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, on page 107, lines 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to raise the question of the Alaskan Railway at this time. That is legislation. The Alaskan Railway will be built. I have opposed the Alaskan Railway, and I am still opposed to it, but the bill is now law and the road will be built. There is no reason for haste in making this appropriation now. The time is not propitious to begin the construction. One million dollars was appropriated when this bill was passed last March, and only one-third of that amount has been expended. There is near $700,000 of that amount available for present demands. Congress will meet in regular session in December. The amount already appropriated will pay expenses of locating the proposed route. In the meantime we hope to see the Treasury replenished. There is no reason or justice in appropriating $2,000,000 at this time, when the Treasury is depleted and a special stamp tax is being collected to meet the necessary running expenses of the Government. When this bill was passed the Treasury was overflowing with money and no war clouds threatened the peace of the world. When the money already appropriated is exhausted there is no reason why the work should not be abandoned until taxes can be collected in the usual way and the peace of the world restored. The whole country is depressed. It is bleeding at every pore—North, South, East, and West—on account of the European war. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Oh, gentlemen on the Republican side know the reason for the depressed condition of the country, and it is perfectly silly for anyone to say that the European war is not causing it. How about Democratic prosperity before the European war? You can not convince the intelligent voter that the Democratic administration caused this depression.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRIBBLE. Yes.

Mr. FALCONER. Does not the gentleman know that Alaska in the next six months will send probably ten or twelve million dollars of gold into the United States?

Mr. TRIBBLE. How much has it ever sent here?

Mr. FALCONER. From seventeen to twenty million dollars per annum.

Mr. TRIBBLE. And how will this railway aid in the sending of gold into the United States?

Mr. FALCONER. It will increase it greatly. When the railroad is completed and developed it will send probably fifty or sixty million dollars into the United States.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I stated in the beginning of my remarks that I did not care to raise the question of the benefits resulting from the Alaskan Railway and the objections to Government construction and ownership. I raise the question now of the propriety of appropriating $2,000,000 at this time. There could not be a more inappropriate time. My motion is to strike the $2,000,000 from the bill. I am informed that this money is wanted for the purpose of purchasing certain railways in Alaska owned by corporations and, I am informed, operated at great loss. I would like to know from the chairman of this committee why it is that two millions is asked for now, when not a plow has been put into the ground to build a railroad, not a shovel has been purchased, and nothing has been done. That is no small amount of money, and I would like to hear from the chairman of this committee why it is asked for now.

Mr. MADDEN. How is this commission that has been appointed going to pay its expenses if it does not get the $2,000,000?

Mr. TRIBBLE. What expenses have they?

Mr. MADDEN. That is all there is to the commission.

Mr. TRIBBLE. They had a million dollars, and they have used one-third of that amount already, and two-thirds of a million dollars should certainly pay the engineers in Alaska who are locating the railroad until this Congress meets in December.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman does not understand, evidently, the extravagant waste of money that this commission indulged in, or he would not say that.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I am sure there is great extravagance in the use of money there, and that is one of the reasons I am objecting to this, and I thank the gentleman for the suggestion.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Georgia yield to the gentleman from California?

Mr. TRIBBLE. I am asking the gentleman from New York a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, $1,000,000 was appropriated in the act authorizing the construction of railroads in Alaska. That act authorized the appointment of a commission. That commission went to Alaska, and has made very extensive surveys and examinations of properties, and is now preparing its report. It expended $378,000.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. I understood the Delegate from Alaska to say when the bill was up for consideration in the last session of Congress that all of the surveys had been made, and all the commission would have to do would be to select the route.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then he did not know what he was talking about, because this commission has made a survey.

Mr. WICKERSHAM rose.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, I did not mean to be offensive in that statement. I think that perhaps there must be some misunderstanding.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I did not make any such statement.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This commission has made a survey of the route over which it is believed nobody has ever passed at all, and they are now preparing their report. When the report is submitted to the President, the President must first locate the route, and after the route is located, if it be from points where there are existing railroads, or where existing railroads can be utilized, he must determine whether an attempt will be made to purchase any of the existing railroads.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask that my time be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Now——

Mr. TRIBBLE. I want to ask the gentleman this question: What is the necessity, until this commission makes a report, for according to the gentleman's statement only one-fourth of the money—I was in error when I said one-half——

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will let me proceed for a moment or two——

Mr. TRIBBLE. This is in my time, and I am asking the gentleman a question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand; but I will answer the question. The statement I make I think will answer the gentleman's question. It is expected that in the immediate future the President will determine the route to be selected. This money is necessary, because as soon as the route is selected, whether it is proposed to purchase a road or not, it is designed to utilize the coming season for construction purposes. If it is determined to purchase an existing road, it is desired to have sufficient money to make a substantial payment on account of the purchase. There seems to exist good reasons, if one of these roads is to be purchased, to attempt to complete the purchase at this time——

Mr. TRIBBLE. Does not the gentleman think it would be better for this Congress to wait until the commission reports?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I do not.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Let them make their report to this Congress, and if they say it is desirable to buy a certain railroad in Alaska, let this Congress pass upon the question of whether it proposes to buy a Guggenheim, Morgan, or any other road in Alaska.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I do not think that at all, because this Congress, after a very full, deliberate, and extensive consideration of that question, determined that it would place the power and responsibility upon the President of the United States. I was not in favor of the construction of railroads in Alaska. I am acquiescing in what Congress determined, and I think it the part of wisdom, from the information that I have been able to obtain, that so long as Congress has determined to construct this road, to comply with the request of the Secretary of the Interior and appropriate this money at this time.

Mr. TRIBBLE. I want to ask the gentleman if it was not frequently stated on the floor of this House that it was not proposed to buy these railroads, but this money was to be appropriated to build railroads?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think it was stated that the purpose of passing the bill to authorize the construction of railroads in Alaska was not primarily designed to purchase any railroad, but the bill as worked out provided that the President should select a route of a proposed Government road. If it were ascertained that the route selected was one where an existing road could be utilized, the President was authorized to purchase the road, but was limited in the price to be paid to the appraised value of the road determined by the Government commission. Now, it depends on whether the route selected be one side or the other of Prince William Sound.

If it be one or the other, after whichever side is selected, they were to proceed to build the road to Fairbanks first. Then, whether it is desired to utilize as part of the system to be constructed either the Alaska Northern or the Copper River road, if it was decided that it would be the part of wisdom to attempt to utilize either one of those existing roads, it would be necessary to ascertain whether the road could be purchased within the terms specified in the law. Now, the information is that the Department of the Interior will be prepared at the end of the season, this coming working season, the summer months, to proceed upon a route which will be selected with this construction work. It may be necessary or desirable to attempt to purchase an existing road and to make payment on it. My own belief is that since this work has been authorized, and since in fact it has taken from private enterprise all incentive to build railroads in Alaska, that the United States should proceed to do what is contemplated by the law as rapidly as can reasonably be expected, or else it should repeal the law, so that private enterprise may have the opportunity.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask for one minute.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TRIBBLE. Mr. Chairman, all I care to say is that the time is not propitious to continue this work in Alaska and there are about three-quarters of a million dollars unexpended. I assert that this money is being appropriated for the purpose of buying railroads in Alaska, and I say this is no time to appropriate to buy railroads in Alaska or anywhere else. Who wants to sell a railroad, and why this haste? These are questions that Congress should investigate before taking money raised by stamp tax, when the people are suffering in this period of financial distress. I appeal to you to keep this money at home for the comforts of our suffering people. I stand ready to appropriate money to furnish means of transportation of our corn, cotton, wheat, and other agricultural and commercial products, thus helping to relieve the congestion of the country, but I can not sit without protest and see $2,000,000 spent in Alaska when it is so badly needed at home.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the paragraph in order to perfect it. I move to strike out the figure "2" and insert the figure "1," so as to make it read "$1,000,000" instead of "$2,000,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 107, line 11, by striking out "$2,000,000" and inserting "$1,000,000."

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt now, and I had none when the bill was before the House providing an appropriation for the construction of a Government-owned railroad in the Territory of Alaska, that existing railroads constructed there would be taken over by the Government, and if I could have had any doubt at that time all doubt of that has been removed by this time.

It was charged repeatedly when that bill was under discussion that certain parties opposing the enactment of the bill were favoring certain individuals who owned railroads up in that country. That was not the fact. They were opposing it because they did not think the condition of the Government funds in the Treasury at that time would justify such an appropriation. But since that time and within the last four weeks the representatives of the men who own those railroads have been to the Department of the Interior and to the executive branch of the Government, to get them to take over their roads, and all that you need to do is to examine the testimony contained in the supplemental hearings, which I shall ask leave, before I conclude, to put in the RECORD in connection with my remarks.

In the testimony of the Secretary of the Interior he mentions proposed construction in one word and devotes two pages to a discussion about taking over the Copper River Valley road and the Alaskan Northern, one or other other. He says that one or the other of those two routes should be selected. Of course we know that when it comes to that proposition they are not going up there to parallel one of those roads already constructed. Whether you write it in the bill or not, it remains true, nevertheless, that these engineers will in all probability recommend that it will be better to take over the Copper River Valley road or the Alaska Northern than it would be to undertake to construct a parallel line, for the reason that the men owning those roads will probably offer the Government such a proposition that the Government can more cheaply buy than to construct a road to parallel them and take chances in the future of making anything out of the investment.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Would it not be good business if the Government could buy an existing road, or a portion of a road, rather than to build another? Would not that be practical business judgment?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I should think it would, but I think when we start in with an appropriation for that purpose we ought to say that that is what we are going to do, and not beat about the bush in order to relieve those men of something that they can not get rid of otherwise.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. If we put in these words to buy the roads up there, we would thereby give those parties such an advantage that they could charge any price they wanted and would not that defeat the object of the legislation?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I did not say write it in the bill; but if it were written on the face of the bill it would not stand out more clearly to the American people than it did when the bill was drawn. We knew then that that was what was intended. Mr. Lane, the Secretary of the Interior, says they will buy if satisfactory arrangements can be made to take over one or the other of these routes.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma yield to the gentleman from Washington?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I do.

Mr. FALCONER. Can the gentleman tell us whether it is the intention of the administration to take over and buy one or the other of these railroads?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I did not say so.

Mr. FALCONER. The gentleman said, and the previous speaker said, that the object of this was to buy railroads.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I said the object was, according to the testimony of Secretary Lane, to do one or the other. When the President had selected the route he would follow from the coast to Fairbanks they would buy one or the other of the railroads. That was in the supplementary hearing. In the first hearing Secretary Lane did not know whether or not they would submit an estimate of an appropriation, but subsequently, when I saw Mr. Kenzey and others at the White House, the proposition of an appropriation of $2,000,000 was included in the bill, and to carry it out Mr. Lane says if they reach an agreement with reference to buying——

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. The gentleman does not mean to say that if the Government should buy one of these roads that would be all the development in the way of building railroads in Alaska that was contemplated by the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. DAVENPORT. No.

Mr. GOOD. That would be practically the beginning of the project that would be undertaken, as I understand it.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I understand it this way: I do not mean to say they would not build any more. I think, possibly, if they buy the Copper River Railroad, which is the one that will be bought when the contract is made because it has the best harbor, as I think, they will probably extend the line to Fairbanks.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, pending that request, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the paragraph and amendments thereto close in 25 minutes.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I desire some time.

Mr. MADDEN. Make it an hour. This is a very important matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] asks unanimous consent that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto close in 25 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, there is a strong demand over here for at least 25 minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, they do not all want to talk. I heard some men who said they wanted to talk complaining about the amount of time that had been used here to-day.

Mr. MANN. Well, I want to have five minutes myself, although my request did not provide for it. I think we ought to push this bill along. I think we ought to stay here this evening and push it along.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, I hope the House will stay here to-night. We will say 45 minutes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MANN. Will that give 25 over here?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know. I guess not. Well, make it 50 minutes.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] wants five minutes, and the Delegate from Alaska [Mr. WICKERSHAM] wants five, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], and the gentleman from Washington [Mr. FALCONER]. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph, and all amendments thereto, close in 50 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Connecticut rise?

Mr. DONOVAN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I would like to get a little information from the chairman of the committee as to why there is so much interest all at once in the debate on this proposition? [Laughter.] We have been going along heretofore in free-and-easy style. Why can you not let your associates in?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I can explain to the gentleman, I think.

Mr. DONOVAN. I hope you can.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is a proposal whereby the committee recommends that $2,000,000 be appropriated toward carrying on the work of constructing railroads in Alaska. One element in the House—and I think a large one—believes in prosecuting the work. Other Members in the House believe it would be advisable not to build them at all. Another element thinks it advisable to defer the building. The amount is $2,000,000. It is a large sum, and he matter is a very important one. That is why I am attempting now to get a limit on the debate, before Members get warmed up and want several hours on it.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the gentleman's answer is responsive.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is intended to be.

Mr. DONOVAN. I want to find out what is the reason for this? When we have been lagging and playing along, and things have been going in a haphazard way, what has happened all at once?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman has just come in. He has not been present; that is all.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I say to the gentleman that this bill has progressed much more rapidly than it has been accustomed to progress ordinarily.

Mr. DONOVAN. I wish the gentleman from Georgia had kept his seat, because he always has too much influence with me, and I feel impelled now to take my seat. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Reserving the right to object, I do not care to object, but I want to know of the chairman of the committee if it is his intention to remain in session beyond the consideration of this item to-night?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; I hope we may stay here for some time.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I can not be here all the afternoon, and there is an item on page 111 in which I am interested.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What is the item?

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Platt National Park in Oklahoma.

Mr. FITZGERALD. You get everything you want there.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. If there is to be no objection to that item, I will make no objection now.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There will not be any trouble about that item. If any attempt is made to strike out the item in the absence of the gentleman, I will ask to have the item passed over until to-morrow.

Mr. MANN. I think the Platt National Park item will go through this year without any trouble.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That item is safe.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the debate on the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed in 50 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. DAVENPORT].

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Chairman, I was about to answer the gentleman from Iowa. I know that the railroad is going to be constructed, and I think it is to be constructed as far as Fairbanks, but I do not think there is any necessity at present for so large an appropriation as is contained in this paragraph. If it becomes necessary to purchase either one of the roads—and, as I said a while ago, I am quite sure they will purchase one or the other—they certainly can make an arrangement with the gentlemen who now own these roads, who can not make anything out of them and can not operate them so as to pay running expenses, by which arrangement the President can pay them a sum to hold the trade and bind the bargain, and then wait until it can be reported to Congress what is to be the purchase price of the road, or what the road can be acquired for.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SHERWOOD. How long is that road?

Mr. DAVENPORT. There is one road 196 miles long. That is the Copper River Valley road. The other, the Alaska Northern, is 71 miles long, of which 30 miles are in operation, if I remember correctly. As it is conceded by a great many of the departmental officers that the finances of the country are not in the very best condition at present, I think that $1,000,000 is certainly sufficient to continue the engineering investigation up there, and to make a contract with either of those corporations for the purchase of their road. There is more than half a million dollars of the original appropriation unexpended, and that, with the appropriation of $1,000,000, will give a million and a half to be expended this year in the few months that they can operate up there. We have not got the reports. We do not know what the engineers' reports show. We have no reports whatever, and I find none in the hearings containing anything to show for what sum they may be able to purchase either of the roads. If there has been any proposition submitted, I fail to find it in the hearings, although it may be there. So I say, until we have ascertained what the cost of acquiring the road will be an appropriation of $1,000,000 now in addition to what is already available will certainly be sufficient to carry on the work for the next few months.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Are those roads paying now?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that I do not know, but I know that the hearings on the original bill disclosed that the road 71 miles long was being operated, as they used to say, tri-weekly, for 30 miles. That is, they would run a train up one week and try to get back the next. [Laughter.] The other one is being operated by the owners of the Bonanza mine, and I suppose it is hauling freight, if there is any to haul along the line.

Mr. FOWLER and Mr. LEVY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Oklahoma yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I will yield first to the gentleman from Illinois, and then to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FOWLER. I am anxious to know who are the owners of these two roads?

Mr. DAVENPORT. The Morgan interest and the Guggenheims own the Copper River road; and the other line, if I recollect aright, is owned by a man named Belaine, or some such name as that, or at least he is largely interested.

Mr. LEVY. Is it no more important to appropriate this money for Alaska than to appropriate the $3,000,000 for the physical valuation of railroads in the United States——

Mr. DAVENPORT. I think not.

Mr. LEVY. When we have taken $550,000,000 out of Alaska in minerals and other products, with no internal improvements made by the Government?

Mr. DAVENPORT. I do not know that we have taken out $550,000,000 yet. The greater part of the minerals that have been shipped out of Alaska have come from the seaboard, from the coast, and very little of it, except from the Bonanza mine, owned by the Guggenheims, and some other smaller mines and carried over the trail, have come from the interior.

Mr. LEVY. But already $550,000,000 have been taken out of Alaska.

Mr. DAVENPORT. I can not say how much, but minerals to quite a large amount and value have been taken out of Alaska.

Mr. BARTLETT. It is contemplated, is it not, to buy one of these railroads, and how far would $2,000,000 go toward buying a railroad at $40,000 a mile?

Mr. DAVENPORT. That is the point I am making; until we find out what we can purchase them for, there is no need of making any appropriation.

Mr. BOOHER. As I recall, Congress has nothing to do with the price of the road. The President fixes the price of the road and makes the contract.

Mr. DAVENPORT. That is correct.

Mr. BOOHER. Then, why should we wait any longer for a report to Congress?

Mr. DAVENPORT. Because the President always does, and will when he makes a deal, make a report to Congress and ask for an appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to make this statement. Debate, by order of the committee, is limited to 50 minutes. The Chair has requests from 10 Members for that time. If an extension is granted to any speaker, others will necessarily be cut out. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that his time be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, in view of the situation, I object.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to incorporate the testimony of Secretary Lane given in the supplemental hearings on the sundry civil bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the testimony:

FEBRUARY 1, 1915.

ALASKAN RAILROADS.

STATEMENT OF HON. FRANKLIN K. LANE, SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR.

The CHAIRMAN. We have before us, Mr. Secretary, an estimate just transmitted for the construction and operation of railroads in Alaska, to be used for carrying out the provisions of the act approved March 12, 1914 (38 Stats., 305), entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to locate, construct, and operate railroads in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes," the additional sum of $2,000,000 to continue available until expended. In the act providing for the construction of railroads in Alaska $1,000,000 was appropriated?

Secretary LANE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. You are now asking for $2,000,000. Will you state the situation, please?

Secretary LANE. We have about half of that million dollars left, and we have asked for $2,000,000 more, so that we may begin construction this spring. The President has not decided on which side of Prince William Sound the road should run. We have not, in fact, got the completed report, nor any report in writing from the engineering commission as yet, but they have consulted with the President and advised with him as to the condition of the roads that exist up there and the nature of the routes and the approximate cost of the road that is proposed from the coast to Fairbanks and the interior. Of course there can not be anything done toward the purchase of any of the roads there, either the road running from Seward north, called the Alaskan Northern, or from Cordova up to Chitina, called the Coper River & Northwestern, until the President decides which route to follow. I suppose as soon as that report is made by the engineering commission to him he will decide what route is best to follow. Then the probability is we will take up at once negotiations, if he thinks it is advisable, for the purchase of one of those roads.

The CHAIRMAN. It is proposed to build a road from one side or the other of Prince William Sound to Fairbanks?

Secretary LANE. That is the main trunk line.

Mr. GILLETT. How much did you say that would cost?

Secretary LANE. Of course, if we bought the Cordova road it would depend upon the terms we could get, and that is also true of the Alaskan Northern, which runs for 71 miles. The road outside of that would probably cost an average of over $40,000 a mile, somewhere between $40,000 and $50,000 a mile. From Chitina on to Fairbanks it would run in a country where construction would probably be cheaper, but where there is very little land available for agricultural purposes for the first 100 miles.

Mr. MONDELL. Are you still considering, Mr. Secretary, the possibility of entirely new construction?

Secretary LANE. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. I mean new construction for the entire distance.

Secretary LANE. For the entire distance; yes. There is one new route from Portage Bay. Portage Bay is about opposite Valdez on Prince William Sound. It is one of those little inlets from the sound itself. Portage Bay is cut off from Turnagain Arm by two large mountains, and Turnagain Arm runs into Cooks Inlet. There is a very practicable harbor at Portage Bay that it would be necessary to tunnel to, and those tunnels would probably amount to a total of approximately 3 miles, or perhaps 3½ miles. We have got figures made on them. Then we would run up on the north side of Turnagain Arm through the Susitna Valley, then across Broad Pass down through the Tanana Valley to the Tanana River, and across the Tanana River to Fairbanks. That is a road that would be entirely new.

Mr. SHERLEY. What distance would that be?

Secretary LANE. About 418 miles. There is not very much difference in any of these routes.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the distance to Fairbanks?

Secretary LANE. Yes. Then, on the same side you could take Seward as your terminus instead of Portage Bay and run up approximately 60 miles to Turnagain Arm, and from there on by the same route.

Mr. MONDELL. In that event you would utilize part of the——

Secretary LANE (interposing). We would then utilize part of the Alaskan Northern road, which is now being operated about 30 miles out of Seward, but which was constructed a full 71 miles. That runs for a short distance on the north side of Turnagain Arm, but the road itself is not operated the full distance.

Mr. MONDELL. As an alternative have you also had under consideration the proposition of building to the Bering River field in order to utilize those coals without deciding fully as to your main-line construction?

Secretary LANE. Yes; there is a proposition that has been considered in the past, and was reported on by the old railroad commision of which Mr. Brooks was a member—which reported two years and a half ago—for building from the Bering River coal field down to Controller Bay, a distance of about 26 miles. That route was, I believe, originally outlined by a man named Richard Ryan, who was in to see me the other day about it. He thinks that by building a branch from the Copper River road at mile 40, extending it over a distance of about 60 miles to the Bering River field, and then from the Bering River field down to Controller Bay, he would be able to get all of the copper ore that originates on the Copper River road smelted on the Bering River coal fields themselves; put up a smelter there where the coal is or else down at Controller Bay. The estimate of the old commission for protecting a harbor at Controler Bay was about $2,000,000, because it would be necessary to build a breakwater and make Controller Bay into a practicable harbor, and I just state the figure from recollection; but he thinks it could be done for $800,000, and has presented a proposition to which he wants us to give consideration—that instead of our going into the Bering River field some permit or right be given him to go in there and make that connection. I suppose that it is a possibility that Mr. Morgan, if he retains the Copper River road, would want also to drive over from his road to Bering River field and tap that for purposes of coking coal, and perhaps he would put up his smelter at the junction of the two roads or else down at Cordova.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the act a commission was appointed?

Secretary LANE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Will you state the names of the members of the commission?

Secretary LANE. Mr. William C. Edes, who for the last 25 years was engaged in locating roads for the Southern Pacific, Central Pacific, and the Santa Fe; Lieut. Mears, who was the general superintendent of the Panama road.

The CHAIRMAN. And built the relocated line?

Secretary LANE. Yes; and Mr. Riggs, who surveyed the boundary line between Canada and Alaska.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you recall when they were appointed?

Secretary LANE. I think they were appointed about the last part of April.

The CHAIRMAN. Of last year?

Secretary LANE. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. And you say they have gone to Alaska and surveyed these two routes on each side of Prince William Sound?

Secretary LANE. I can tell you in some detail what they have done, if you care to hear it.

The CHAIRMAN. I think that would be interesting.

Secretary LANE. They made an appraisement of the Alaska Northern road.

Mr. SHERLEY. Have we a map of Alaska here?

Secretary LANE. I think I can give you a rough outline of the situation. This is supposed to represent Prince William Sound, and this is Cordova, and here is the present Copper River & Northwestern road, which goes up to a place called Chitina and turns on down south [indicating].

The CHAIRMAN. Is that what is called the Morgan road?

Secretary LANE. That is commonly called the Morgan-Guggenheim road. This is Seward, and up here runs the Alaska Northern. That is the road that Mr. Ballaine was interested in originally, and that runs up to mile 71. Here is Portage Bay, and this is Turnagain Arm, and this is Cooks Inlet, and this is the Pacific Ocean here [indicating].

Mr. GILLETT. Why should they have run that railroad up there [indicating]? Is not this deep water?

Secretary LANE. Yes; that is deep water, but there is a mountain range, and it would require 3½ miles of tunnel to get to Portage Bay, and besides there is very good territory in here with a lot of small gold properties and a considerable amount of agricultural land in small valleys.

The commission divided itself in this way: Mr. Edes went to a point here called Ship Creek, at the head of Cook Inlet. He then surveyed this route down to Portage Bay. He surveyed this route and also a relocation of the road down to Seward and made an appraisement of that road. He also went from Ship Creek up to the head of Matanuska Valley, where the coal fields are, a distance of about 75 miles. Then Mr. Mears went from that junction point, at the mouth of the Matanuska Valley, up through the Susitna Valley to Broad Pass. There he was met by Mr. Riggs, who had come down the Yukon River and had made his headquarters at Fairbanks, and at Fairbanks he surveyed the route from Fairbanks over to Broad Pass. They met there and went over the route that Riggs had already surveyed and attempted relocations. Right here are the Great Nenana coal fields, to the north of Broad Pass, a great field of lignite, where they have veins exposed for 40 or 50 feet; a perfectly marvelous thing. It is a good grade of lignite. It will last under exposure for perhaps 30 days.

If they could do here as they do over on the border line between Alaska and Canada—transform the coal into power at the mine—they could use it most profitably. They attempted to mine that lignite and transport it down the Yukon Valley and found that to be a failure, because the coal would slack in a very short time after exposure; so they have to put up the power plant right at the mine and use the coal as soon as it is taken out, and transport the power to Dawson and all of the mining field around there, and that is a very practical scheme, and it is being done to some extent at the Pennsylvania field now for supplying some of the Pennsylvania cities with power instead of transporting the coal.

After Riggs and Mears got to Fairbanks they came down over this route to Chitina, making a reconnaissance survey over this line that had already been surveyed by the commission of two years ago. Then they went down over the Copper River road to Cordova, then across over to Seward, and came up over this line again and made an appraisement with Mr. Edes, of the Alaska Northern, and an estimate of the cost of the Portage Bay project. The commission also sent a company of men through the Susitna Valley and through the Alaskan range on the west side of the Susitna Valley over into the Kuskokwim and Iditarod country, which lies to the west of the Susitna Valley about 350 miles. They found a new pass. A reconnaissance survey had been made of that route two years ago, or a partial survey, and it was found that a very heavy grade was the best that could be done. Our party found a new canyon and a new route which made a practicable grade from Susitna Valley over to the headwaters of the Kuskokwim.

The CHAIRMAN. Some of the most valuable land is supposed to be in the Kuskokwim.

Secretary LANE. They do not know about the agricultural land, because that has not been developed much.

The CHAIRMAN. I thought it had been.

Secretary LANE. No; there has been very little done in an agricultural way there, but there are, I believe, some gold placers and two or three small quartz properties.

The commission then had an agricultural survey made of all the lands in the Susitna Valley, of the lands at the headwaters of the Kuskokwim, of the lands around Fairbanks and in the Tanana Valley, and the lands in the Chitina Valley.

In addition, they ran a line from the Chitina Valley at a place called Copper Center westward down into the Matanuska field, so as to see what kind of a grade they could get from the Matanuska coal field eastward to this Copper River road if it were extended up to Fairbanks. They made a reconnoissance survey also out of Valdez over what is called the Richardson road, which is a Government road, to see what kind of grades they could get passing over the range there, and from a point on that road southward through a subsidiary stream down to the Copper River to see if it were possible to get an easier and better and cheaper route to maintain than the present Copper River road, so that it would go something like this [indicating] northward from Copper River and then down into Valdez.

The CHAIRMAN. You speak of the Richardson road—is that the road built by Col. Richardson?

Secretary LANE. Yes, sir; by the United States Government. That road extends all the way from Valdez to Fairbanks.

Mr. GILLETT. That is a highway?

Secretary LANE. Yes, sir; not a railroad. I think that is all that was done, and inasmuch as they could not get to work until the middle of June, which was the first day they could get into the country and work, I think they did exceptionally well.

The CHAIRMAN. They are engaged now in preparing reports of their work?

Secretary LANE. Yes; they are preparing a report on what they have done. Of course, their survey is not complete. Over the Susitna route they have a stake every hundred feet, but they do not know that that is the best possible route that could be made all of the way. That is particularly true when you get into the Mount McKinley country just southwest of Broad Pass. It may be they can find an easier and cheaper route than the one they have already surveyed and staked.

Mr. MONDELL. Did they also make any examination of the route from section 40 or in that locality on the Copper River road to the Bering field?

Secretary LANE. No; they have not attempted to do anything with the Bering River field except to connect up with an old survey.

Mr. GILLETT. How large a force did they have?

Secretary LANE. I think, roughly, 300 men.

Mr. GILLETT. How could they spend so much money?

Secretary LANE. We had a very close analysis made of their cost, and, of course, everything is very expensive, because everything has to be transported up there. There is no road up the Susitna. There is not even a trail through the Susitna Valley. On one side of the valley it is entirely bog and on the other side of the valley it is a forest.

Mr. GILLETT. Is Susitna the name of the river?

Secretary LANE. Yes; the Susitna River goes right through the center of the valley. What we want to do is to be in a position to begin operations in June, wherever we are going, and we want to have some leeway, so that whatever road we determine to purchase, if we determine to purchase any, we will have some kind of a deposit to make on it.

The CHAIRMAN. And before you can start to do anything you must determine whether you are going to purchase one of the roads or not?

Secretary LANE. I think the first thing to do is to determine the route—which side to go up.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the law?

Secretary LANE. Yes; and then the second thing is to determine whether you want to buy any one of the existing roads or not.

The CHAIRMAN. The law provides they shall be purchased at their appraised value?

Secretary LANE. Not to exceed their appraised value; yes.

The CHAIRMAN. So that your purpose now is, after the route is determined, if you decide to purchase one of the roads, to purchase it and then be able to go ahead with the construction work in addition?

Secretary LANE. Yes; so as to get our coal available as soon as possible. That would be my idea.

The CHAIRMAN. That would be the first thing to do?

Secretary LANE. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. I suppose you can not give us any more in detail what you want to spend this money for?

Secretary LANE. No, because we do not know what road we will buy, or whether we will buy either one.

The CHAIRMAN. Could you furnish us, Mr. Secretary, with a detailed statement of the expenditures already made, and put that in the record?

Secretary LANE. Yes.

(The statement is as follows:)

THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 3, 1915.

DEAR MR. FITZGERALD: In accordance with your request to me when I was before your committee the other day with respect to the appropriation for the construction by the Government of railroads in Alaska, I send to you a statement showing the expenditures made by the Alaskan Engineering Commission, in itemized form. This statement may be subject to a slight revision, but in no ways material to the actual amounts shown.

Cordially, yours,

FRANKLIN K. LANE.

Hon. JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
House of Representatives.

Analysis of expenditures made from the appropriation for the "Construction and operation of railroads in Alaska" to Jan. 31, 1915.

Equipment of camps and surveying camps:
Purchase of surveying instruments	$10,384.92
Tents and tarpaulins	4,435.92
Stoves, tools, utensils, and supplies	8,481.12
Guns and ammunition	357.18
Cameras and photo supplies	1,308.35
Blankets and other bedding	3,411.00
Drugs and medicines	645.76
Freight	3,061.59
		$32,085.84
Pack animals and outfits:
Purchase of pack animals	22,227.00
Freight—
Railroads in United States	196.48
Ocean steamers	2,922.00
River steamers, Alaska	1,491.35
Railroads, Alaska (included in ocean freights), lighterage and wharfage	119.00
Hire of pack animals	5,084.62
Purchase of pack outfits	4,824.36
Supplies for outfits	309.77
Freight	51.13
		37,225.71
Purchase, maintenance, and hire of boats:
Purchase of boats—
Launches	3,249.14
Other boats	1,066.65
Repairs and alterations	1,227.52
Gasoline, oils, grease, and supplies	3,742.60
Hire of launches	5,107.75
Berthing boats for winter	126.50
Freight on boats	545.80
		15,005.96
Salary and wages:
Commissioners and office force—
Field season	17,609.89
After close of field service	12,519.00
Field employees, including temporary service after close of field service	156,983.96
Employees in Alaska, left in custody of live stock and other property after close of field season	1,850.00
		188,962.85
Stationery and drafting supplies:
Purchase of stationery and technical supplies for both office and field, including typewriters and certain instruments not segregated	5,156.84
Freight	344.42
Advertising	50.92
		5,552.18
Subsistence:
Primary cost of provisions	35,614.64
Freight	4,682.76
Hotels and restaurants—
In United States	2,406.88
In Alaska	5,155.23
Other subsistence items	1,044.65
Per diem in lieu of subsistence	7,463.00
		56,367.16
Subsistence and care of pack animals:
Hay	13,274.94
Freight	1,511.93
Oats and other grain	4,587.26
Freight	281.17
Salt	49.93
Stabling and care of pack animals—
During field season	579.85
Contracts for wintering	2,021.84
Medical attendance and medicine	119.80
Shoeing	606.25
Shoes and nails	418.33
Freight	27.92
		23,479.22
Storage and rent of offices and warehouses:
In Alaska	443.39
In United States	947.10
		1,390.49
Telephone and telegraph:
Telephone	251.87
Telegraph	224.57
		476.44
Passenger transportation:
Railroads, United States—
Railroad fares	2,526.23
Pullman fares	647.40
Trolley	4.90
Railroads in Alaska	3,144.05
Fares for water travel—
Ocean steamers	17,209.95
River steamers, Alaska	6,660.60
Launches, Alaska	728.90
Automobiles, Alaska	204.00
Automobiles, United States	128.00
		31,254.03
Furniture:
Purchase of furniture	651.25
Rent of furniture	39.21
		690.40
Medical attendance and hospital bills		296.85
Drayage:
In Alaska	207.00
In United States	65.73
		272.73
Total		293,059.92
Costs per mile.
Total expenditures to Jan. 31, 1915		$393,059.92
Less cost Kuskokwim reconnoissance		14,872.00
		378,187.92

By charging the balance of all expenditures against the 1,070 miles of accurate surveys an average is obtained of $353.45 per mile.

The total cost of the Kuskokwim reconnoissance, as nearly as can be estimated without an exhaustive examination of account, but which will be found to be exceedingly close, is $14,872. With a survey of 726 miles, the average cost per mile is $20.48.

The cost of equipment is found to be $58,044.63, of which about 75 per cent is still available. To this should be added provisions on hand estimated at between $4,000 and $5,000.

Equipment	$58,044.63
Less depreciation and loss of 25 per cent	14,511.14
	43,533.49
Add provisions on hand	4,000.00
	47,533.49
Total cost of accurate surveys	378,187.92
Less equipment and supplies on hand	47,533.49
Balance	330,654.43

In round numbers, $330,700.

By giving the above credit to amount expended it is found that the cost of accurate surveys is about $309 per mile.

Summary in miles of line surveyed.

Final location	122.86
Preliminary surveys	875.99
Valuation surveys	70.8
Reconnoissance surveys (Kuskokwim)	726
Total	1,795.65

DEFINITIONS.

Final location: Lines ready for the construction engineer carefully marked on the ground with curves fully defined.

Preliminary surveys: Lines marked on the ground which, in connection with accurately taken topography, are used as bases from which to plan location.

Valuation surveys: Existing trackage rerun and measured, quantities measured, and a valuation placed on all improvements.

Reconnoissance: Exploration surveys to determine route possibilities. Grades and elevations determined by less refined methods than in preliminary surveys. All quantities estimated only approximately.

The ALASKAN ENGINEERING COMMISSION,
Washington, D. C., February 2, 1915.

Mr. GILLETT. I suppose whether you buy or not, in either case you expect to go on and begin construction work this summer, do you not?

Secretary LANE. Yes. We can not do anything on either side of Prince William Sound that will be of consequence unless we have enough money to pay something down on one of the roads, if we determine to buy one of them, and do some construction work; and, of course, there will be a considerable preliminary investment necessary for the doing of any construction work.

The CHAIRMAN. Do you mean that if you are to do any work during the coming season, commencing in June, from the information you have, an appropriation of $2,000,000 is necessary?

Secretary LANE. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. In addition to what you have on hand?

Secretary LANE. In addition to what we have on hand.

The CHAIRMAN. What would you say as to appropriating $1,000,000 instead of $2,000,000, so that you would have about $1,500,000?

Secretary LANE. That would not give you enough to do anything, if you were compelled to buy, or if you saw fit to buy, any of the roads.

The CHAIRMAN. If you determined to buy one of the roads and you made your arrangements to buy one of them, that would be all you could do with such an appropriation. You could not do any construction work?

Secretary LANE. You could not do any construction work.

The CHAIRMAN. So that part of the season would be lost for that purpose?

Secretary LANE. Yes.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Secretary, would there be any particular loss, aside, of course, from the postponement of the project, if nothing should be appropriated now, and the matter should be permitted to go over for another year?

Secretary LANE. Of course, the loss of time would be a very vital consideration with the people there.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the fact that no surveys were made to the Bering field indicate that the commission were of the opinion that the probability was that you would first want to utilize Matanuska coal?

Secretary LANE. I think this is the significance of that, that the Bering survey that has already been made is a very good and satisfactory one. The country is almost level, running from Controller Bay up, and they know approximately the amount of work that will have to be done on that route. I think you could almost begin work on that this year with the surveys we already have.

Mr. MONDELL. That were made——

Secretary LANE (interposing). That were made by the Copper River people; that were made by Ryan, and by our old Board of Engineers.

The CHAIRMAN. Mr. Secretary, we had an expedition to Alaska which brought back some coal that was tested out for the Navy, and my recollection of the report is that the coal clinkered so badly that it was stated that it would not be possible to use it for Navy vessels. Now, am I correct in supposing that there has been another test made with different results?

Secretary LANE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Can you tell us what the results of the test were?

Secretary LANE. Yes, sir. The practical outcome of the last test is the decision that for naval purposes this coal is as good or about as good as Pocahontas coal.

The CHAIRMAN. Was that coal taken from the same coal field?

Secretary LANE. It was taken from the Matanuska field.

The CHAIRMAN. The field from which the other coal was taken?

Secretary LANE. I do not remember whether there were two tests of coal taken from the Matanuska field or not, but one test was made of Bering River field coal, and that was a very poor test, so I am led to believe. It was a very poor test, because the coal was very much mixed up with clay and foreign matter. The result of that test was an adverse report. In the Matanuska test I am rather inclined to think—although this is hazy in my memory—but I am inclined to think that there was a body of Matanuska coal taken out at one time upon which there was an adverse report, but there was a very small amount of it. The last report, however, upon the Matanuska coal was very favorable.

The CHAIRMAN. That early report I had in mind led to the conclusion that Alaska coal was unsuitable for the purpose.

Secretary LANE. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. It led to the conclusion that Alaska coal was unsuitable for use in Navy vessels; and then my attention has been called to the fact that there has been a more recent test, the results of which were very different from those of that preliminary test.

Secretary LANE. I can send you a copy of that report.

The CHAIRMAN. We will be glad to have it.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, SUMMARY REPORT ON TEST OF MATANUSKA COAL.

Port test, seven days: All coal, ash, and clinker were weighed, one boiler was used, forced draft was necessary on two days. Run-of-mine coal was used for five days, slack for one day, and lump coal for one day. There were no casualties. Coal burned very freely. Firing was very good, the analyses of flue gases giving rarely below 9 per cent of CO_2. There was little clinker, but the ash was several per cent higher than with the Pocahontas coal. Draft was good and coal burned with bright yellowish flame. Coal coked very nicely; the coke was friable and very easily worked by the firemen. Fires 6 inches to 8 inches thick were carried most of the time, although occasionally they were heavier. The ash fused into clinker on the grate bars; generally about 2 inches thick, medium weight, porous, a little tough and hard while hot but friable when cold. The clinker had a little ash mixed throughout the mass. It stuck a little to the bridge wall, but not seriously. The soot deposit was about 25 per cent more than with Pocahontas coal. The soot was a little different from that of the Pocahontas as the granules appeared as minute fused grains. The load during this week of test would ordinarily have required two boilers burning Pocahontas coal.

Four-hour forced draft: Fires thin; dampers partly closed. Fires burned brightly; work of firing very easy on account of ease of breaking up the coke. Furnaces one mass of yellowish flame. Not an excessive amount of ash formed. The men, on being questioned, all said it was the easiest 20-knot run they had ever made.

Twenty-four hour 15-knot test: Started with 12 boilers, but necessary to cut out 4 boilers to get the highest efficiency. Coal burned with greatest ease, forming a very easily worked coke, not an excessive amount of ash or clinker, and in general appeared easier to handle than Pocahontas coal. CO_2 analysis generally high, over 9 per cent. Fires, carried 6 inches to 8 inches thick, were always glowing, ash pans bright, and the furnaces a mass of yellowish incandescent flame. Coal burned like pine knots. The amount of clinker was not excessive, was more or less easy to work and very friable when cold. Fires were noticeably hot. Amount of soot made was a little higher than is usually made by good Pocahontas coal, about 10 per cent more.

Ten-knot test: Started with six boilers, but it was found necessary to cut out two boilers to give greatest efficiency. This power was more than ample, as at times there were four evaporators in use. Fires were very easily worked; the coke broke up easy; clinker was not very hard; bright, level fires from 6 inches to 8 inches thick and sometimes thicker were carried, and CO_2 was generally high.

General remarks: There was very little foreign matter. The slack appeared to burn better than the lump. No evidences of gases being given off from the coal during the test. The noticeable characteristic of this coal is friability. Lumps pulverize very easily.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
BUREAU OF MINES,
Experiment Station, Pittsburgh, Pa., December 17, 1914.

Subject: Report on tests of Matanuska coal on U. S. S. Maryland.

The DIRECTOR: The following is Mr. Flagg's report upon the tests of Matanuska coal aboard the U. S. S. Maryland.

INSPECTION AND LOADING.

Upon the Maryland's arrival at Bremerton a visit was made to the coal dock, where some 7,700 sacks of the coal were stored under cover. On account of the receipt of a letter from the Bureau of Steam Engineering stating that preliminary tests at Annapolis indicated high ash content and instructing that the necessary preparation be given the coal, a preliminary inspection was made to gain some idea as to the quality of the coal. Rough determinations of the ash contents of the different sized parts of a sample taken from six bags at random failed to show any excessive percentages of ash, so the coal was loaded onto the lighters and placed in the ship's bunkers.

During the loading of the lighters a shovelful of coal was taken from every fifth bag and retained for a sample. This sample (of about 3 tons) was worked over and one can retained. From the same sample a portion (about 800 pounds) was taken for a sizing test. The percentages of the different sizes, the analyses of the samples of the several sizes, and the analysis of the general sample are given in attached sheets.

SEVEN-DAY PORT TEST.

The port test was begun as soon as one lighter of coal had been taken on. The load during part of the test period was heavy, but was carried throughout the test on one boiler. Fires were cleaned every 12 hours, by which time about 2 inches of clinker had formed. The clinker was medium weight, rather porous, and dark colored, with small pieces of light-gray ash mixed in with the fused portion. The clinker stuck some to the bridge wall, but not enough to cause serious trouble, and did not stick to the grates at all. In the furnace the clinker could be broken fairly easily; when cold it was brittle and easily broken.

During the port test the gas analyses showed 10 to 12 per cent CO_2 with probably three-tenths to four-tenths per cent CO. The effort was to carry fires 7 to 8 inches thick, but they were heavier much of the time, thus accounting in one way for the presence of CO.

The soot formed was comparatively free from tarry matter, and hence did not adhere to the tubes as much as does that from Pocahontas coal, although the amount of soot formed by the Matanuska coal was more than with Pocahontas.

The figures for the evaporation, on account of the difficulties incident to the measurement of the feed water, can only be considered approximate at best. The figures obtained during the port test showed an evaporation equal to or a little better than was obtained during the test with Pocahontas coal made by the Maryland in 1913.

On the last two days of the port test the use of screened coal was tried. The coal for this purpose was screened on the lighter alongside the dock. One day all of the coal remaining on a 4-mesh screen was used, and on the other that which passed through the screen. The only trouble experienced with the finer coal was that the natural draft was not quite strong enough to maintain the required rate of combustion at all times.

TWENTY-KNOT TEST.

The excellent steaming properties of this coal were plainly shown in this test. For a time it looked as if it would be possible to make the turns for 20 knots without putting on the blowers, but it was not done. With about three-fourths inch pressure of air in the firerooms, however, there was an abundance of steam, and steam could be raised to the popping-off pressure at any minute. This condition obtained throughout the four-hour test, and at its close the fires were still in excellent steaming condition.

FIFTEEN-KNOT TEST.

For the 15-knot test 12 boilers were lit up, but soon after the test was started 2 of these were put out and later a third. During the remainder of the test the turns were kept up most of the time with 8 boilers working and the ninth banked. Difficulty in maintaining the desired steam pressure with the 8 boilers was experienced only at times of cleaning the fires, and then only when the fires were cleaned too soon after each other. For cruising at this speed it has been the practice to use 10 boilers with eastern coal.

TEN-KNOT TEST.

Six boilers were lit for this run, but one was banked almost at the start of the test, and later it was cut out. About two and one-half hours after the test started a second boiler was banked, and this was cut out when the test had been in progress nine hours. During the remainder of the test four boilers only were used, these furnishing plenty of steam to make the proper number of turns and keep the regular auxiliaries going. For this speed the practice has been to use six boilers with Pocahontas coal. So far as is known, the Maryland has never before made turns for 10 knots with only four boilers in use.

GENERAL.

The coal as stored on the dock was dry but was wet on the lighters after they were placed alongside the ship. Neither on the dock nor in the bunkers was any tendency to heating noticed. The coal was almost entirely free from lumps, but, for the most part, was not objectionably fine.

It is a very friable coal, has moderate coking tendency, and is excellent for steaming purposes. The volatile matter appears to be fairly easily driven off but is not difficult to burn.

From the standpoint of smokelessness the coal is also very desirable. Under natural draft the stack observations ranged between No. 0 and No. 3 (Rengelmann chart), averaging somewhat above No. 2. Under forced draft during the four-hour run the smoke averaged about the same but showed less of the heavier smoke. The smoke is somewhat less in density than that from Pocahontas, and it is not as black.

Both officers and men cooperated heartily with the bureau's engineer throughout the test, and this cooperation was one factor contributing to the success of the tests.

Very truly, yours,

(Signed) O. P. HOOD,
Chief Mechanical Engineer.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Secretary, I want to go a little further into the inquiry made by Mr. Gillett—that is, whether there is any other reason, further than the loss of time, why it would not be advisable to fail to make an appropriation at this time. You spoke of negotiations for some roads and also of the fact that the people up there were anxious to get their roads built. Of course, that is an anxiety that has existed for some years.

Secretary LANE. I do not know what other reasons could be given for any kind of improvement except the need of it for the development of the country. This enterprise has been embarked upon, and it strikes me that it would be wise for us to do something upon it. Now, the expectation was, or, rather, they thought we should have some five or six million dollars for expenditure this year, and I think the bill as originally brought in contemplated some very large expenditures. I should say that $2,000,000 is as small an amount as you could well spend this year, if you are to do anything at all. Certainly, if you are to buy any road and pay anything down on that road, we could not have much left for building anything.

Mr. SHERLEY. In the event that you built and did not buy, would the building open up a good deal of territory that otherwise would not be opened up?

Secretary LANE. Yes, sir; and did not buy?

Mr. SHERLEY. And did not buy.

Secretary LANE. We would open up a good deal of territory in any event.

Mr. SHERLEY. I understand; but what I had in mind was this, whether the building would simply mean practically the paralleling of one or the other of those roads or whether it would mean a route remote enough from either one of those roads to give that much additional transportation facilities to Alaska.

Secretary LANE. If we build on the west side, from Ship Creek up, it will be all new territory; and if we build on the east side, from Chitina up, it will be all new territory, as it is not contemplated—at least, not in my mind—to build a road competing with either one of the existing roads, unless we find that they are not reasonable as to terms.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I voted reluctantly in favor of the Alaskan railroad bill. At that time it was a question of whether there was any coal in either the Bering or the Matanuska fields that would be of value to the Navy. Since that vote was taken it has been proven positively by the tests made by the Navy Department that the coal in the Matanuska field is of superior quality and as good as that of the Pocahontas coal used by the Navy.

The question before the committee is whether we should try to develop and reach the Matanuska field. Under the Alaskan railroad bill authority is vested in the President to purchase, if he determines, at a price not to exceed the appraised physical value, any existing railroad. The survey has been made and $350,000 in round numbers has been expended. They are now waiting to go ahead with the project. Undoubtedly the Alaskan Northern Railroad, which is built from Seward north 71 miles within 70 miles of the coal field, can be purchased at a reasonable value.

We left it to the President to determine whether it is more economical to purchase the existing road or build an additional one. There have been surveys made as to the building of a separate line to reach the Matanuska field, and everything awaits the decision of the President. Certainly it can not be claimed that whether we should build the entire road to Fairbanks or build on to the existing line from its terminus is a legislative question. That must be determined by the Secretary of the Interior and the President. I do not think there is anyone here who questions the good faith and the honesty of purpose of the Secretary and the President.

Now, why do they need $2,000,000? They do not contemplate the purchase with $2,000,000 of any existing line of railroads. It is necessary to deposit a substantial amount toward the purchase of one of the lines.

The gentlemen opposing the proposition to-day are those who opposed the original bill. That is not fair; for, by the action of Congress, it was determined that a certain policy should be adopted to extend these roads or build the road to reach the coal field; and it is not fair for those who opposed the original policy to hamstring it with no provision at all.

It is a business proposition. The Navy Department comes here and says that there has been coal discovered of high value that will save the Government hundreds of thousands of dollars in the transportation; and there is not a person, when he passes on that question, but what would say that that was a sufficient argument to vote for this proposition to give the President the authority to carry out the purpose of the law.

Oh, you can readily hold the matter up and suspend it in the air, saying that we will chloroform the project by withholding all appropriations entirely. But after Congress has passed on the project, has voted in favor of the measure, I do not believe that we should attempt to stab it indirectly by withholding appropriations. That time is past. It is the same Congress that passed on the project originally, and this is only in furtherance of the project by voting the necessary appropriation.

Secretary Lane, in the hearings, said it was proposed originally to recommend $7,000,000 or $8,000,000, but he curtailed it to $2,000,000, the lowest possible amount, so as to have sufficient for a bonus or part payment in case they determined to purchase one of these lines.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. Chairman, this presents simply a plain business proposition for the Congress to look at now. The matter of building a railroad or railroads in Alaska has already been passed upon and determined by this Congress. The Congress has expressed its view and it has enacted a law that railroads shall be built in Alaska within certain limitations, and has also provided that a certain amount of money shall be expended for that purpose. The President is given the power to locate this road and to determine where it shall run from the southern coast of Alaska into the interior. In that same law he is given the power to purchase other railroads in getting a connecting line from the seacoast into the interior if he finds that he can make a business deal with the owners there that will be advantageous and that would be a good bargain for him to make for the Government. He has that power. You have already given him that power. It is no longer a question to be considered. The question now is an appropriation of $2,000,000 for the purpose of carrying out a thing already decided upon. It occurs to me that is a very small amount to ask for, because we all know that the season for building railroads in Alaska is necessarily limited. We know that if we are going to get any work in there in 1915 the more money they have to do what can be done the better progress can be made, and there is no economy in having a small amount appropriated in view of the fact that you have to expend a certain amount to build your railroads, and your time is short. It is economy to avail yourself of whatever means you have and to do it quickly. There is much more to justify the building of the road now than there was when the bill was passed.

One of the great features that was contended for by the advocates of that bill was the benefit that this Government could get from the coal that was in Alaska. It had been claimed that tests had been made, and that it was not good for naval purposes. It was insisted by the Committee on the Territories that had investigated the matter that there was coal there admirably fitted for naval purposes. Since that time the test has been made, and the report is that it is as good as the best. What time could there be when we might be more in need of coal for naval use on the Pacific coast than right now, and the sooner we get that coal the greater the benefit will come from it. This railroad was not provided for for the purpose of buying a railroad or of enabling anybody to sell a railroad. The legislation was passed for the purpose of building railroads to develop Alaska. The President was given the power, if in his judgment he saw fit, to buy other lines in making this main line. If he is going to buy a railroad, give him the means to carry out the deal. If he is going to construct one, then give the President, through such agencies as he shall appoint, money enough to go to work to build the road. That is a mere business proposition. There is no business man who can look at it in any other light than that it is economy to amply supply the President with such means as he can make available within the season that is now coming on. We have had some temporary surveys made. The report has not yet been made as to what the surveys are. If they are sufficient for the President to decide where he will build the road, then he will construct it if necessary. So far as I am concerned, I am in hopes that he will not buy many miles of railroad. There is the Copper River Railroad of 186 miles, and I hope that he will not buy that, for the simple reason that Alaska already has that railroad, and the object of this legislation was to supply Alaska with railroads. I want this money expended in building other miles of railroads, so that Alaska may be developed. [Applause.]

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE] to strike out this section. I made the same motion in the committee, and if no one else had made it I would have made it here. But I have tried several times to come to the rescue of the Treasury, and my advances have not been received on that side of the House with the cordiality which my disinterested purpose deserved, and I hope, now that the motion comes from the gentleman from Georgia, it will receive better attention. I base my reason on the fact so graphically and correctly stated by the gentleman from Georgia, that the country to-day is bleeding at every pore and I do not think we ought to bleed it any further. This Congress, despite its condition, is putting the knife in deeper and deeper, and more and more copious streams of blood are coming out, and you are not doing as we did when we bled the Treasury. You are not supplying new blood, new revenue, to come in and take the place of that which is extracted. But there is a deficit staring us in the face. I have said it so many times I do not like to say it again, and I know you still less like to hear it again, but now is the time to dispense with luxuries and satisfy ourselves with necessities, and it seems to me this railroad is not a necessity. The only argument that was brought before us in our hearings which indicated that this money really was needed this year was the suggestion that one of the railroads might be purchased, and now perhaps was a more advantageous time than any other because otherwise it might be sold to somebody else or developed. But I suspect that the Secretary who told us that was not thoroughly informed, because I have heard from several sources that that railroad has been bankrupt for a long time. They have been trying to sell it, and it can not be sold, and they are looking to find a purchaser and it probably will not be sold. Certainly human nature would indicate that when there is a possibility of the Government paralleling it nobody is going to purchase that road until we have determined what the Government is going to do. So it does not seem to me there is any pressure now to get that railroad. If we are not going to get that, I see no reason for haste.

In regard to the coal fields that the gentleman from Wisconsin speaks about, they have found excellent coal there, but whether it is so located and whether it is not so broken it would not be available for commercial use has yet to be decided. The mere fact that they have found specimens of excellent coal does not show that it is merchantable coal and that the railroad will ever bring it out in useful amounts.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILLETT. No; I have not the time. Now, I think the gentleman stated a very fair argument that those who are opposed to this railroad in general ought not now on that ground to combat it; but it is not on that ground I place my opposition, though I admit I was one of those who were strongly opposed to building this railroad by the Government. I did not think it was a good investment for the Government. I do not believe it will ever be remunerative. I think it will be extremely costly and extravagant. But I recognize the House voted for it. The House, I assume, still is in favor of it, but that is not the argument which I suggest. The ground on which I to-day place my opposition is the same ground on which I have opposed other appropriations in this bill. There is no necessity for this expenditure, and here is a saving of $2,000,000, which the Treasury sadly needs.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I presume the proper thing to do is to make the appropriation now, since we have passed the bill; but whenever anybody has any old junk in the shape of a railroad or a lot of rotten ships to sell and they can not sell them to anybody else they come to Congress and get a law passed authorizing the Government to buy them. That is what we are doing now. That is what the Senate is trying to do now—to pass a bill to buy ships. We passed a bill to buy a railroad, and we are undoubtedly going to buy it. When this bill was up for consideration a great many men in the House said that we were going to build railroads in Alaska to prevent the monopolists from controlling Alaska and from preventing highway robbers from charging freight rates that were beyond reason, and they named the Guggenheims and others. I think I recall saying on that occasion that if any of these men had violated the law they ought to be arrested, prosecuted, and put in jail, not favored by money from the Government with which to buy railroads.

If we are going to build railroads to develop the coal fields, we ought to build our roads, not buy junk and not relieve men who are already overridden with mortgages from the burdens which they are carrying with means obtained from the Treasury of the United States. Every city in America to-day is witnessing the spectacle of men in the public service either being discharged or reduced from $1,200 to $1,000 a year because of the lack of funds with which to pay them, and yet we go on and appropriate money and empty the Treasury at the expense of the blood, bone, and sinew of the men who are at work in these great departments of the Government. We have no thought or consideration, but we go on with our reckless waste and extravagance and appropriate money to build railroads and buy junk in the shape of streaks of rust in the form of railroad tracks, and junk in the form of ships that are being wasted, tied up at the docks, with no money in the Treasury, and yet continue to tax the overburdened idle people of America in order that the administration may have its way. The American people are going to speak upon this question if they have not already spoken. The time is coming that you will hear what they have to say. There is no public sentiment for this character of expenditure, no public sentiment whatever, and I regret that we are pledged under the law that is already enacted to appropriate this money to authorize the purchase of roads which the men who favored the enactment of the law denounced when the bill was under consideration during the last session of Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] made the statement that the Delegate from Alaska, when the Alaska railroad bill was originally under discussion, declared that surveys along the proposed routes had been actually made and all that was necessary was to choose the route.

Mr. MADDEN. I said I understood so.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Well, the Delegate from Alaska was interrogated about that matter at very considerable length when making his statement in support of the original bill, and the gentleman from Illinois was probably justified in his understanding, because the Delegate from Alaska did at that time say that each one of those proposed routes had been surveyed.

One of them had been surveyed for the route of a Government military wagon road, and the other had a preliminary survey line run over it for a railroad; and upon interrogation by different Members of the House I went into that matter and explained quite fully and according to the facts. The RECORD will show how fully, but no statement was made that the surveys for a railroad had been completed, and that the only act remaining was to choose the route.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] reminds me that when the original bill was before the House he said that if transportation men, and specially mentioned the Guggenheim interests, had violated the laws of the United States relating to monopoly and extortion in respect to transportation in Alaska they ought to be arrested, prosecuted, and punished, and not favored by the purchase of their roads.

Mr. MADDEN. I say so now.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I have the pleasure to inform the gentleman from Illinois that since the date when he said that the United States District Court at Juneau, Alaska, did that very thing—found them guilty and then fined them $25,000 upon their plea of guilty. They admitted the charges made against them, and which I repeated on the floor of the House at the time mentioned, and came into court and paid their fines. The Alaska railroad bill is doing much good in many ways, and Alaska is confident that it will yet do much more.

Mr. Chairman, some gentlemen in the House seem to be greatly excited over the thought that the President of the United States may purchase the Copper River & Northwestern Railway, often called the Guggenheim Railroad, in Alaska. I am surprised at gentlemen on that side of the House pointing the finger of suspicion at President Wilson and Secretary Lane, and suggesting that in some way or other they are going to fail to live up in good faith to the purposes of the Alaska railway act, which authorizes the President to locate and construct railroads in Alaska, and that the administration will fail to do its duty, but will purchase the Guggenheim railroad. And if I did not misunderstand the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE], he declared that that was the purpose of the appropriation of this $2,000,000.

Now, if I did misunderstand the gentleman, I apologize. If I did not, I challenge his statement. It is not true. There is no man on the floor of this House who knows what route the President will yet choose. He has not yet said to the country what, in his judgment, is the best route over which to build the railroad authorized by the act. The only evidence we have on that score is the evidence of Secretary Lane, stated in his testimony before the subcommittee of the House Committee on Appropriations. There he asked for $2,000,000, and stated that less than one-half of the original million appropriated had been expended.

On the next page of this testimony, all of which the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. DAVENPORT] will put in the RECORD, he is asked this question by Mr. MONDELL:

> Are you still considering, Mr. Secretary, the possibility of entirely new construction?

Secretary Lane said, "Yes."

> Mr. MONDELL. I mean new construction for the entire distance.
> Secretary LANE. For the entire distance; yes.

Now, it is true that in his statement he said, "Of course, if we bought the Cordova road it would depend upon the terms we could get," and so forth. But in no part of his statement does he say that it is the intention to buy either the Copper River or the Alaska Northern Railroads; nor is there any official statement from the President or anyone that it is the purpose to buy the Guggenheim road; and I am just as justified as the gentleman from Georgia when I assert that it is not intended to buy that road. The testimony of the Secretary is that this appropriation of $2,000,000 is to be used for new construction, although Secretary Lane does say that the President may negotiate for the purchase of one of the present roads if the President thinks it advisable.

And the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. TRIBBLE], in a most eloquent statement, described the conditions of the Government finances and declared that they are being so rapidly reduced that there is a need to limit appropriations. He asserted that the Government finances are being dissipated, that the body politic is bleeding at every pore, and for a Member from that side of the House he certainly made a frank attack on the financial policy of this administration. Aided by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT], he makes out a strong case of blood letting on the part of the administration which he so ably assisted into power and which is now attempting by progressive legislation to open the door to development without monopoly in Alaska.

Let me say to the gentlemen who are so excited over the thought that the building of the Alaskan railroad will further diminish the lifeblood of the Nation that Alaska is producing what you say is running so rapidly out of the body politic, to wit, gold. Here is the report of the collector of customs of the Territory of Alaska for the year 1914, and it shows that in that year Alaska produced gold to the amount of $14,729,906. It shows also that in 1914 the people of Alaska purchased merchandise from the merchants of the United States to the amount of $21,610,860. The imports of Alaska for 1914 were $25,849,944, and the exports $44,614,696. The total trade with the United States was $70,464,640. We sent you copper, $3,365,342; canned salmon, $17,906,215; and gold, $14,729,905.

Let me show you how that affects the railroad for which this appropriation is being made. The output of gold from the Seward-Valdez-Cordova region—the coast terminal region of the road—for the year 1914 was $1,491,248, while the people there purchased merchandise from the United States of the value of $4,039,705, a total from that end of the proposed railroad for the year of $5,530,953. The output from the Fairbanks end of the road for 1914 was: Gold produced, $6,399,315; merchandise purchased from the United States, $2,978,640; a total of $9,377,955. Both ends of the proposed line in 1914 produced gold and bought merchandise of the total value of $14,908,908. Every dollar of that sum came into the channels of trade in the United States, and it will be greatly increased by the building of the road for which the appropriation is being made.

Some inquiry is also made as to the amount of mineral wealth which Alaska has produced since its purchase in 1867. Senate Document No. 882, Sixty-second Congress, second session, contains the details of this and other trade values of Alaska prepared by me up to 1911. It shows that to that date Alaska's sea and fur products amounted to $222,710,036, while the mineral products amounted to $206,813,594. The report of the collector of customs for Alaska for 1914 shows that for the years 1912, 1913, and 1914 the mineral products—gold and copper—amounted to $55,726,065, which added to the total to 1911 makes a total for mineral products in Alaska from 1867 to 1914 of $262,539,659. The amount of the sea and fur products is even larger, and the grand total of the products of Alaska for the period from 1867 to 1914 is more than $550,000,000.

If the gentlemen from Georgia and Massachusetts want to stop the financial body in the United States from "bleeding at every pore," as they described it, let them study the Alaskan trade reports and assist in pushing this railroad to completion, and Alaska alone will fill the United States with the golden lifeblood in such quantity as to make such pleas more laughable in the future than they are now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alaska has expired.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD by adding thereto the annual report of the collector of customs of Alaska for the year 1914.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HUGHES of Georgia). If there is no objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The report is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
UNITED STATES CUSTOMS SERVICE,
OFFICE OF THE COLLECTOR,
Port of Juneau, Alaska, January 25, 1915.

This report of the general trade relations of the Territory shows satisfactory results and evidences a substantial growth. The increase of business over the previous year indicates that had Alaska not been materially affected by the general commercial depression which retarded some important developments, reduced the price and production of copper and certain fish products, this year's transactions would have been the greatest in its history.

Imports and exports of foreign gold and silver, and most of the exports foreign, as shown below, are in transit. The other items cover the real trade of the country.

The value of fur shipments by mail, amounting to $182,084, was received too late to be shown in the table. This amount added to the value shown below gives the proper total.

The following table of passenger movement indicates the travel, by regularly established routes, to and from the district and the Yukon Territory. Tourists and cannery employees bound for remote places are not included.

The Eagle and Dawson movement shows the local frontier travel, which must not be considered with the general account, as the greater number of those passengers arrived or departed from Ketchikan or St. Michael and have been accounted for in their returns:

An indication of the industrial progress of the Territory is found in the quantity of merchandise imported from the States. Developments and operations in the southeastern division were very active during the first half of the year, and had they continued a very interesting return would have been made; the result, however, shows a satisfactory increase over the previous year. The southern division makes some improvement, but the divisions where the great gold placers are located have met with the natural decline due to the exhaustion of the more easily exploited deposits.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, may I inquire how much time is remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Twenty minutes remain.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I did not support the proposition for the Government to engage in railroad building and operation in Alaska, as I would not support a proposition for the Government to engage in that business anywhere. I did not believe it was a governmental function, and I do not believe so yet. However old-fashioned that idea may be, I expect to hold to it for some time, at least so long as I have my faculties of reasoning about it and reflecting upon what I have studied and read and the conclusions I have arrived at upon that subject.

But it is not because I opposed that bill, nor is it because I opposed that policy, that I shall support the amendment to strike out this provision of $2,000,000 or vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. DAVENPORT] to make it $1,000,000. That project can wait. The expenditure of large sums of money upon this project can wait for a year; it can wait until a more propitious season and a more propitious time, when we can be enabled, by reason of an improvement of the present condition of affairs prevailing, by which our revenues have been reduced, to supply the necessary money to carry out this project.

Why, nothing has been done, so to speak. True, they have spent a large sum of money, some $330,000, in making the survey, but even yet they have got no report. They have a verbal statement from these people who have gone up there and driven stakes and gone over the land, but they have no written report about what the cost will be.

Mr. HOUSTON. Does not the gentleman understand that the engineering commission are now preparing a report, and that they have not yet completed it?

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not deny that.

Mr. HOUSTON. They can not file it until it is completed.

Mr. BARTLETT. They have not had the time or the energy to complete it, or they have not devoted their time to it, I do not know which. They have not yet made a report upon which Congress can act, so that Congress can ascertain what they have done and what they expect to do. Yet we are asked now, simply because this may be a favorite project, to carry out somebody's policy, to appropriate this large sum of money, when we do not know what they have done or what they propose to do. We do not know what the expenditures may be in the future. I have made no misstatement about it. We have not yet, says the Secretary, got the completed report, nor in fact any report in writing.

I do not know anything about it, except what the Secretary testified before the Appropriations Committee. He said we have not got any report in writing.

It is proposed now to embark on this unusual and, in my judgment, unnecessary and improper policy of the Government engaging in this sort of business, to show that we are so anxious to spend the money of the Government.

Mr. HOUSTON. I want to ask if the gentleman does not realize that there is nothing involved in that report except the mere matter of location?

Mr. BARTLETT. Oh, well, it is important to know how much money is to be required, and they do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has expired. The gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] is recognized.

Mr. BRYAN. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois to make a brief statement.

Mr. MANN. I want to make this statement, if I may: When the Alaska Railroad bill was brought into the House, it provided for the sale of bonds to pay for the cost of the railroad. We struck that out in the House. I did what I could to have it go out, and we took that action, with the statement that we would provide by appropriations for the necessary construction and so forth of the road as we went along. And I feel under a moral obligation myself, and I think the House is under a moral obligation to make this appropriation, and such others as are necessary for the road, within the original limit of cost. [Applause.]

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I think there is no one on this floor who doubts the absolute sincerity of the gentleman who is the senior member of the minority on the Appropriations Committee [Mr. GILLETT] when he makes this statement that he would like to strike this appropriation from this bill. We all like him, and we know he is sincere. We also like the distinguished gentleman from Georgia on the other side of the House [Mr. BARTLETT], who, I understand, would also like to strike this appropriation from the bill.

I call the attention of this House to the fact that only yesterday the same distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] moved to strike from this bill the appropriation of $3,000,000 that was given to the Interstate Commerce Commission for the physical valuation of the railroads of this country, and in that motion had the support of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT]. I suppose in doing that Mr. GILLETT expressed the position that he would take in case the Republican Party were in power and he was the chairman of that committee. I do not know. I suppose he would be loyal to his ideas. But when it came to a vote here on this floor on a division there were only 13 Members who were with the gentleman from Massachusetts. There were only 13 who would stand for the striking out of the appropriation for the physical valuation of the railroads.

Mr. BARTLETT. We were few in numbers, but a very select company. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRYAN. A very select and bright and shining company, and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] is one of the most able, and I think perhaps the most able, of that entire company, being equaled in ability only by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

I wish also to call attention to the fact that when this Alaska bill was passed there was an amendment offered in the Senate providing for not less than $10,000,000 or more than $20,000,000 for the building of ships to engage in ordinary merchant shipping, and not less than a dozen Senators—one Progressive, nine Republicans, and two Democrats—voted for that ship-purchase bill over there. That shows that there was no objection at that time on the part of these gentlemen to the idea of Government ownership or to the principle of Government ownership of the Alaska railroads and of ships; and when they object now to the principle of Government ownership as applied to ships or as applied to the Alaska railroad they are inconsistent and do not pursue the same course that they pursued when that bill was before them. The inexplainable inconsistency some display is beyond my power to understand. The people are going to want to know why such glaring inconsistencies exist.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I suggest to the gentleman that he does not mean, of course, to say that I voted for Government ownership of anything.

Mr. BRYAN. Oh, no; I said in the other House. While the gentleman is eminently qualified to represent his State in that other body, I referred to the action of the Senate and not to anything that took place here.

If this project had been a matter of private ownership and the building of the Alaska Railroad by a private corporation, undoubtedly by this time they would have issued $100,000,000 of bonds for the water boys of Wall Street and $100,000,000 of stock for the cash of the widows and orphans and another $100,000,000 of stock for bonuses, and I do not doubt at all that the Yukon River would have been diverted from its course, and the water of the Yukon would have been turned into the stock issues of the Alaska Railway enterprise, after we had given to them all the land they wanted, and all the town sites and coal deposits they wanted, and all the other natural resources they would have demanded. I am glad this Congress has to go on record again for Government ownership of railroads. We are going to show to the world that the Government can build a railroad economically. We are going to show the railroad builders of this country a few tricks in the matter of the building of railroads in Alaska. We will show them that their pretended capitalization of $60,000 a mile is an absolute farce, and that the Government can construct railroads much more cheaply than they have constructed the other lines in this country, and can keep out the water and can operate them cheaply, too. [Applause.]

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, it is well known that I opposed as vehemently as I could the bill for building the railroad in Alaska. I thought it was ill advised and bad policy, and I have not changed my mind since. I agree with what the gentleman from Illinois said, that the House is to a certain extent under obligation to pass this appropriation for $2,000,000 as carried in the bill.

Anyone reading in the supplemental hearings the testimony of the Secretary of the Interior must see that the Secretary intends to recommend to the President the purchase of one of the existing railroads in Alaska. I believe he should be given the money to take advantage of the bargain, if there are any bargains in Alaska, to make a payment on an option in the next six months or a year in buying one of the railroads.

Still reserving my opposition to the whole proposition, I expect to vote for this $2,000,000. The argument of the gentleman from Alaska presents us with the fact that the Matanuska coal fields have been found to have better coal than we hitherto supposed, and that this road will probably be projected through to the Matanuska coal field, and on the ground that it will hasten the day when in the winter we will have cheap coal and in the summer cheaper ice I expect to vote for the appropriation. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is any doubt in the mind of anybody as to the situation touching the building of the Alaskan railroad. Certainly I have no desire to leave the committee under any false impression. I believe that it is very likely the President will see fit to buy one of the existing railroads in Alaska, and I think if the terms are proper he would be very foolish not to do so.

I do not believe that we could possibly justify the building of a parallel line to an existing railroad just for the sake of having the Government build the line. Now, if the line determined upon happens to be over a route that is already partially equipped with a railroad, common sense would indicate that we should buy the railroad already there, if it can be bought on reasonable terms.

With that situation confronting us, it would be manifestly unwise and improper not to provide the President with funds sufficient to take advantage of any proper offers that might be made.

We have determined the broad, basic question of policy. We have decided to build a railroad in Alaska, whether wisely or unwisely, that is behind us.

Now, there are some things that a legislative body can properly do and do better than can be done by any individual. Those things that properly belong to a legislative body are things relating to a policy. But when it comes to the execution of the policy, when it comes to the administration, then the very numbers of a legislative body disqualifies it from wisely determining what to do.

This Congress very wisely left to the President the carrying out of the policy which it had determined—the building of a railroad in Alaska. Now, when he comes to us and says conditions are such as to warrant an appropriation of this amount of money being made at this time, to say that unless we know the particular route and the exact amount of money to be expended we will not make the appropriation is to undertake to determine what this House can not determine, no matter what information is given it; the very size of the body prevents its giving a judgment of as much value as that of an administrative officer charged with the responsibility of seeing the work done.

Aside from this, we committed ourselves to this appropriation by providing that Congress should control the appropriations in lieu of a bond issue. For us to undertake to stop the work would be to exhibit bad faith, after the House, upon the assurance that was given, particularly by the Committee on Appropriations, when we voted in favor of the alternative plan of annual appropriations rather than a bond issue. I believe in carrying out the agreement, and I think it is up to the House to appropriate the money.

A good deal has been said about the condition of the Treasury. I recognize that we ought not to be as prodigal now as we might feel disposed at other times to be; but if the logic of the gentleman from Massachusetts was carried to its legitimate end, we would simply refuse to pass the sundry civil bill at all or we would cut out nine-tenths of the things in it, because of lack of any real necessity, which he says is a test. Most things which the Government does could be dispensed with and we would still live and get along; but you have to keep some proper perspective, and we are not in such a situation as to warrant us in stopping everything because it requires an appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Kentucky has expired. All time has expired. The first question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma to perfect the text by striking out "$2,000,000" and inserting "$1,000,000."

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insane of Alaska: For care and custody of persons legally adjudged insane in Alaska, including transportation and other expenses, $70,000.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. About five years ago the Committee on the Territories made a very thorough investigation of the subject of the insane in Alaska. At that time it was found that the conditions that obtained with regard to the insane there were not all that could be desired. As I recall, persons who were adjudged insane in Alaska at that time had to be confined in the jails for days and weeks, and even months, before transportation facilities could be had to bring them, I think to the State of Oregon, where they were cared for in some private institution by contract. Congress then authorized the construction of a building to care for the insane in Alaska, and I would like to ask the gentleman from New York what has been done with regard to improving the conditions there regarding the care of the insane, if anything?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, there has not been any complaint to the committee about the condition of the insane there. I think perhaps conditions have been improved somewhat.

Mr. GOOD. Was the building that was authorized ever constructed?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think not. My recollection is that it was not.

Mr. GOOD. Then we still bring the insane from Alaska down to some place in the States?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. And take care of them under contract?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They take care of them in an institution in Portland, the Morningside Asylum, under contract.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Mr. Chairman, the inquiry made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] relates to a bill that was passed about four years ago for the erection of two dentention hospitals in the Territory of Alaska—one to be erected at Fairbanks and another at Nome. Those detention hospitals were erected under a special appropriation from the Committee on Territories for the purpose of accommodating insane persons and detaining them locally pending their transportation to the hospital in Oregon, where they are permanently maintained under authority of the United States. Those detention hospitals have been built in Fairbanks and Nome. They are each large, commodious, and well adapted to the use for which they were constructed. They are under the care of the United States marshal, who is authorized to employ a guard, who receives $200 a month for taking care of them, but there has never been an insane person detained in either of them yet.

I ask leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD by attaching thereto a letter which I wrote recently to the Attorney General about this matter.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. When were the buildings completed?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. About 18 months ago, or nearly two years ago.

Mr. GOOD. Have they been accepted?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. Why is it they are not used for that purpose?

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I do not know.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The letter referred to is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 6, 1915.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: By the act of June 21, 1910 (36 Stat. L., 852), authority was given and appropriation made for the erection of a detention hospital for the temporary care and detention of insane persons at Fairbanks, Alaska, and at Nome, Alaska; the sum of $25,000 was appropriated, and after a long period of waiting the hospitals were finally completed. Both places are now finished and are in first-class shape for the purpose which Congress intended them in the act mentioned.

Your attention is also called to the report of the governor of Alaska to the Secretary of the Interior for 1914 and to page 29, where you will find this statement:

DETENTION HOSPITALS.

"The work of erecting and equipping detention hospitals for the temporary care of the insane at Nome and Fairbanks, which was begun in August, 1913, was completed during the year. These hospitals were authorized by act of Congress, approved June 25, 1910, but no appropriation has been made for their maintenance, and therefore they have not fulfilled the purpose for which they were intended. The detention hospital at Nome is particularly a necessity, as the remoteness of that place prevents the transportation of insane persons to Morningside Sanitarium at Portland, Oreg., after the close of navigation, or from about November 1 to June 15; hence the need of the hospital for such cases as may develop during the closed season of navigation. This condition applies in part to the detention hospital at Fairbanks, although patients are not infrequently transported during the winter season to Morningside Sanitarium, but they must be conveyed by stage a distance of 375 miles, and thence by rail and water routes to their destination, at a high cost."

While these two hospitals have been waiting occupancy for more than a year the poor, sick, and insane persons at Nome and Fairbanks are still confined in the dirty, foul-smelling, old jails at those places.

Herewith I inclose three photographs, made by Dr. Sutherland, who has charge of the health of insane and other persons in the jail at Fairbanks. These photographs show the exact condition of the room in the attic of the dirty wooden jail at Fairbanks in which insane women are kept when they are so unfortunate as to get into the clutches of the United States at that place. The garret seems to be cut into three rooms, a sitting room 10 feet 9 inches by 14 feet, where the height of the ceiling is less than 8 feet at the highest point, sloping with the roof to the floor. The sleeping room is 12½ feet wide by 14 feet long, with the same kind of a sloping roof, with one window and a door, and then there is a storeroom having no windows. The sleeping room opens off this storeroom only at one side, and the sitting room opens off on the other, and both the sleeping room and sitting room have an outlet to the jail below, down a little trapdoor, and there down a narrow stairway to the jail.

In this stinking hole the United States of America keeps the insane women who fall into their clutches at Fairbanks, Alaska. It is a disgrace to the Department of Justice that such a condition may continue to exist. Some innocent woman who becomes insane is arrested as if she were guilty of a crime and chucked into one of these dirty holes over this old, rotten, foul-smelling jail filled with the stench and curses of prisoners and kept there for months at a time. I am familiar with the situation, and myself have seen women sitting at the front window trying to get a little fresh air. It was after looking at places of this kind for 10 years that I introduced the bill for the building of the detention hospital at Fairbanks. No effort was made for years by those responsible for the care of these people to procure the building of this institution, although it was greatly needed. It was not until last year that the parties responsible for putting up the building were forced to do so, and, now that it is constructed, more than a year has gone by and the Department of Justice has refused to permit those who are unfortunate enough to be insane to be confined in the detention hospital provided by the act of Congress. Gov. Strong calls attention to the situation, and says that the reason the insane persons are not confined at this detention hospital at Fairbanks is that no appropriation has been made for their maintenance and therefore they have not fulfilled the purpose for which they were intended.

Your attention is called to the fact that by the last clause of section 2 of the act of June 21, 1910, Congress provided that "the said hospitals after their erection and equipment shall be under the charge and control of the United States marshal in the division where situated, and the maintenance thereof shall be paid in the manner and from the same fund as the expenses of United States jails under the same marshal is paid." While I was in Fairbanks this summer I discovered the hospital was not being utilized for the purpose for which it was erected, but that it was being occupied by a caretaker who was getting $200 per month for watching it. I was also informed that it was used for raising chickens, and I have a photograph which I attach hereto, with an accompanying letter, which shows the chickens which have been slaughtered in the back yard, hanging by their heels to the front posts of this detention hospital.

The department authorizes the expenditure of $200 a month for watching this building, and if that $200 was utilized in addition to the amount which the department spends for the maintenance of this filthy attic in the dirty jail you would have money to maintain the hospital. Certainly conditions would be very much better under those circumstances than in the jail. Assuming that you take the bed out of the jail, as shown in these pictures, and put it in the new hospital, and assuming that you expend the same sum of money for employing the same officers at the new building that you do at the jail, and assuming that you add thereto the $200 per month which you now pay a caretaker, and the amount you now expend for heat at the hospital would keep the hospital building warm enough to care for the insane in a better way than to confine them in violation of law and in violation of all humane ideas in the jail. It is a shame and a disgrace to the Department of Justice that such a condition is allowed to exist at Fairbanks, and I am sure that when your attention is called to it you will correct the evil.

I call your special attention to the statements made on the back of the three large photographs. The statements are made in the handwriting of Dr. J. A. Sutherland, who has charge of prisoners and insane persons in the jail. He says to you over his official signature that this foul-smelling hole in the garret is a veritable fire trap; that all the windows are heavily ironed, and the only means of egress from the upper story is by means of the staircase down a trapdoor into the jail. He also says that female prisoners and female insane persons are confined in these rooms; that the middle room in the attic contains the only bath in the jail, which is used by both men and women, and gives you the number and photographs of the window and doors. Certainly, the Department of Justice will not continue this vile arrangement when Congress has approved and designated a humane way of caring for the poor women whose only fault is that they are insane.

I have tried every way I could for years to get the United States marshal at Fairbanks to treat these insane women there with common decency and humanity, but it is impossible, and without the Department of Justice shall take this matter up and do what Congress has ordered to be done, they will continue to be kept in this hole, which is not only detrimental to their health and their sense of modesty but is a constant menace to their lives.

I respectfully request the Department of Justice to give this matter immediate consideration and that it give instruction to the United States marshal at Fairbanks to occupy the detention hospital for the purpose for which it is built, even if you have no more money than you now expend upon it. Will you please advise me of your action in this matter?

Before sending this letter I have shown it to Hon. MARTIN D. FOSTER, House of Representatives, who was largely responsible for the passage of the bill for the erection of these hospitals in Alaska.

Respectfully,

JAMES WICKERSHAM,
Delegate from Alaska.

Mr. WICKERSHAM. I wish to add that poor, sick, and insane women are yet mistreated by confinement over the foul jail in Fairbanks, Alaska, by the Department of Justice.

The Clerk read as follows:

Yosemite National Park, Cal.: For protection and improvement, construction, and repair of bridges, fences, and trails, and improvement of roads other than toll roads, including not exceeding $2,700 for maintenance and repair of horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles for use of the superintendent, supervisor, resident engineer, and employees in connection with general park work, $75,000.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 110, line 17, after the word "work," change the comma to a semicolon and insert:

"The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to accept patented lands or rights of way, whether over patented or other lands in the Yosemite National Park, that may be donated for park purposes."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, on that I reserve the point of order.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I will say that the amendment is subject to a point of order. I have taken it, however, verbatim from the provision that is contained in the following paragraph of the bill except the name of the park. This amendment would simply give to the Secretary of the Interior the power to accept gifts or donations of lands and roads to be used for park purposes. As I understand, in the Yosemite National Park there are about 1,000 acres of land owned by private persons, and yet that land is within the boundaries of the park. Such ownership would prevent a general scheme of improvement of the park by the Government. If any of those private owners desired to set up some kind of business or occupation that might be injurious to the operation of the park or conduct a business on private-owned land within park boundaries that would not be permitted on Government land, they could do it and the Government would be powerless to prevent it. I understand that public-spirited citizens are willing to contribute lands from time to time to this park. They ought to be permitted to do so.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this land that is owned by private individuals is similar in character to the park land?

Mr. GOOD. Similar in character, as I understand it.

Mr. MANN. As I understood the gentleman's amendment, it simply provides that if those people are willing to give the land to the Government, the Government officials are authorized to take it free of charge?

Mr. GOOD. Yes; absolutely without any charge on the part of the Government whatsoever. It is the same provision that is contained in the next paragraph of the bill.

Mr. MANN. I can not see why there should be any objection to that as long as it is the same character of land and works in with the park land.

Mr. GOOD. It is within the boundaries of the national park and of the same general character, and if not acquired by gift some day the Government may want it badly enough to purchase it. The Secretary of the Interior should have permission to accept donations of this land, if such donations are made.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOWARD UNIVERSITY.

For maintenance, to be used in payment of part of the salaries of the officers, professors, teachers, and other regular employees of the university, ice and stationery, the balance of which shall be paid from donations and other sources, of which sum not less than $1,500 shall be used for normal instruction, $65,000.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. SISSON. The point of order is that this appropriation is not authorized by law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, for 30 years Congress has been contributing to the support and maintenance of the Howard University. It is an institution incorporated by act of Congress to educate the colored people of the country. It has departments of law, medicine, and theology. Without the aid the Government gives it the institution can not continue. I have not been able to put my hand on the specific act which authorizes appropriations by Congress. Some other gentlemen may have been able to do so. I believe the appropriation should be made, and I think it would be very unfortunate if it is not made.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, with the permission of the Chair, without discussing the point of order, I would like to say a word or two, if the gentleman will reserve the point of order, upon the appropriation itself.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to reserving the point of order for a statement from the gentleman from Kentucky, but I would not want to prolong a discussion of the subject. I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to delay the committee with any lengthy speech, but I do desire to say a word or two in the hope of inducing the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] to withdraw his point of order. I am not prepared, Mr. Chairman, to say that as an original proposition I should have favored the establishment of the Howard University; neither am I prepared to say that I am in full accord with all of the methods of instruction there, or that I have as much belief in the results flowing from an attempt at the higher education of the negro as I should like to have. But I recognize that one of the greatest problems that has ever confronted a people is brought about by virtue of having a large number of people of a different and inferior race among a superior race, and that the problem can not be shirked by those of the superior race; and as a southern man, with the southern viewpoint upon the race problem, with considerable doubt as to the efficiency and the benefits that flow from much of the education offered the negro, I am not willing to close the door of hope in his face, and I am not yet willing to say that I believe that education for him is time and money wasted. I should peculiarly regret having this administration of my party in any way responsible for lessening the educational efforts which are now being made on behalf of the negro. Some of the work that the Howard University is doing is of unquestionable value, that particularly of the medical college. I believe that it is of tremendous importance to the negro, and of almost equal importance to the white man, that he should be made to realize the need for hygiene, for cleanliness of life, for the control of contagious diseases, and I think that any effort that serves to educate, even though it be in a limited way, negro men in medicine, with modern ideas of living, is of great value to the country and of almost equal value to the white people as it is to the negroes themselves.

Now, the Howard University is not a Government institution and does not depend entirely upon Government funds, but it is the only institution of its kind in this part of the country, and it does receive considerable benefit from the appropriations made by the Congress. For us now to deny these appropriations would be seriously to cripple that institution and would be to do a distinct harm, in my judgment, to the negro race. I do not believe that it would in any sense reflect the judgment of the white people of the South. I appreciate that the gentleman from Mississippi has a very proper view against appropriations by the Federal Government to institutions that are not governmental, and yet because of the peculiar circumstances surrounding this and because of the misunderstanding that it would lead to as to the true southern viewpoint touching the negro race, I hope he may find it possible not to make the point of order and to permit this appropriation that has been made for so many years in the past to be made.

I do not desire further to detain the committee, but I feel it would be unjust to myself and to the people whom I have the honor to represent if I did not reflect what I believe to be their viewpoint. The South is expending vast sums of money in undertaking to educate the negro, and while the results are not always what we would have them I do not believe there is any considerable body of men anywhere in the South who desire in any way to curtail this movement to help the negro forward to a broader, higher, better vision, and thereby make him a better citizen of the country. [Applause.]

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SISSON. Does the gentleman want——

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman is going to make the point of order, I hope he will reserve it; I would like to make a few remarks.

Mr. SISSON. How much time does the gentleman desire, two or three minutes?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, four or five minutes.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I withhold the point of order for five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman from Mississippi will consent to withdraw the point of order. I desire to remind him that my understanding is that it was a Democratic Congress 35 years ago that made the first appropriation for the Howard University, and we have been appropriating regularly for that institution for the education of the colored youth ever since that time, both Republican Congresses and Democratic Congresses. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] has well said this is an institution doing a splendid work. It is doing work for a people to whom we, as a people, owe a great deal. The institution can not live without this Government aid, as the gentleman from Mississippi knows. My recollection is that its income, outside of the appropriation made by Congress, is less than 60 per cent of the amount appropriated. This school is the only school of its kind for the colored youth in the United States. Its standing largely rests upon the fact that it is a Government institution or at least an institution largely supported by the Federal Government. It is very economically administered, as all members of the Committee on Appropriations who have studied these items know. It is doing a splendid work with comparatively a small outlay, and I do not think the gentleman from Mississippi wants to put himself in the position, or his party in the position, of declining to continue these appropriations we have been making for so many years, and can not believe he wants to desert the good work of helping the colored people of the country secure a higher and broader education and encouraging them to do their very best in the world.

Mr. GILLETT. Will the gentleman allow me a couple of minutes?

Mr. SISSON. I will reserve the point of order for a few minutes.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I just want to say that I also hope the gentleman will not make his point of order, because if this were an isolated instance, if there were not constant cases in this bill and in other bills exactly parallel to this, I should not criticize the gentleman. But to pick out this one line of appropriation and make a point of order against that will, it seems to me, be taken as indicating a disposition and a temper toward the negro race of which there have been manifestations already in this administration which have excited much adverse comment in the country, which have not tended to harmonize the different sections, and which, it seems to me, the gentleman would not wish to increase.

Now, as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] has said, the South is doing much for the negro. The North is doing much also. I myself, as executor of an estate, in the last few years transferred to an institution in the South in one sum over $300,000 which a client had left to it for the education of the negro—the savings of a pure, self-sacrificing, self-denying, simple life, and it seems to me that when that philanthropy is being shown both in the North and in the South, and when we are appropriating both in this bill and in other bills for a great many other purposes which are not authorized in law, it would be a singular and ungracious act on the part of the gentleman to pick out this one object, for which we have appropriated for many years, and make a point of order against it. Of course the gentleman has the power to strike out this claim by his point of order, but I trust he will not exercise it. When private philanthropy is doing so much the Government might continue its usual practice.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I would like the Chair to indulge me for just a moment. I want to say that in my State we make provision for the education of the negro, and I presume, in proportion to the amount of taxes collected from the two races, respectively, the whites pay a larger percentage for the education of the negro than any other State in the Union. We provide identically the same schools, agricultural and otherwise, for the negro that we do for the white people.

I want to assure the gentlemen of the committee that my reason for making this point of order is because I do not believe that this appropriation ought to be made, even if it were a white school. I think the Government should not appropriate any money to private or sectarian institutions. We are making appropriations in all the States of the Union for the higher education of everybody. Another reason why this appropriation should not be made is that theology is taught. I do not believe that the Federal Government or any State should spend one single penny in support of any school of theology of any kind or character.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield to the gentleman from New Jersey?

Mr. SISSON. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Has not the theological department been abolished and the theological school sold?

Mr. SISSON. It has not been abolished.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I understood it so. We passed a law the other day for the purpose of allowing them to sell their theological school.

Mr. SISSON. That is a different proposition. That was to enable them to sell another piece of land. The whole thing is consolidated.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not think Federal money ought to be appropriated for this institution, and without detaining the committee longer I make a point of order on the item.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] makes a point of order against the appropriation in the bill for Howard University, on the ground that it is not authorized by law. Clause 2, Rule XXI, provides that—

> No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law—

And so forth.

The Chair called upon the chairman of the committee, Mr. FITZGERALD, to cite any authority of law for this appropriation, and he failed to do so. Section 3597 of Hinds' Precedents provides—and that is a ruling by this House—that "those upholding items in an appropriation bill should have the burden of showing the law authorizing it." That is the unbroken precedent of this House.

Now, the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] stated that this appropriation had been made from year to year. That is true. But under the rulings of the House the fact that an appropriation has been made from year to year, if unauthorized by law, does not make it in order. I cite section 3588 of Hinds' Precedents, which reads as follows:

> An appropriation for an object in an annual appropriation bill makes law only for that year, and does not become "existing law" to justify a continuation of the appropriation.

Following the rulings above cited and on account of the fact that there is no authority of law cited to authorize this appropriation, the Chair sustains the point of order, and the item is stricken from the bill. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For tools, materials, fuel, wages of instructors, and other necessary expenses of the department of manual arts, $12,000.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. For the same reasons the Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For books, shelving, furniture, and fixtures for the libraries, $1,500.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order for the same reasons. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For improvement of grounds and repairs of buildings, to be immediately available, $10,000.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. For the same reasons the Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Medical department: For part cost of needed equipment, laboratory supplies, apparatus, and repair of laboratories and buildings, $7,000.

Mr. SISSON. I make the point of order on that, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. For the same reasons the Chair sustains the point of order. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For material and apparatus for chemical, physical, and natural-history studies and use in laboratories of the new science hall, including cases and shelving, $2,000.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, this building was constructed by the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This building and the apparatus in it were provided for out of an appropriation made by Congress.

Mr. SISSON. This is not for an addition to the building. This is for chemical apparatus and materials.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear from the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This building is called "Science Hall." It was constructed out of an appropriation made by Congress. Now, "Science Hall" is a hall in which there are chemical, physical, and natural-history laboratories, and this appropriation is for materials for use in the laboratories which belong to such a building, together with cases and shelving in such a building. The building was paid for by Government appropriations.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman permit the Chair to ask him a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Has the Government any interest in this building, or in any of the buildings of the Howard University?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I guess the building belongs to the University. I think it does. We appropriated the money for the new "Science Hall," for the building.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless the gentleman from New York can cite a statute authorizing the appropriation the Chair, for the reasons given in the ruling on the first point of order, will sustain the point of order. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For fuel and light: For part payment for fuel and light, Freedmen's Hospital and Howard University, including necessary labor to care for and operate the same, $3,500.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In all, $101,000.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the same point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Enforcement of antitrust laws: For the enforcement of antitrust laws, including not exceeding $15,000 for salaries of necessary employees at the seat of government, $300,000: Provided, however, That no part of this money shall be spent in the prosecution of any organization or individual for entering into any combination or agreement having in view the increasing of wages, shortening of hours, or bettering the conditions of labor, or for any act done in furtherance thereof, not in itself unlawful: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for the prosecution of producers of farm products and associations of farmers who cooperate and organize in an effort to and for the purpose to obtain and maintain a fair and reasonable price for their products.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I call attention to the paragraph which has just been read for the purpose of saying that if any gentleman wishes to move to strike it out I hope he will do so now and not complain of lack of opportunity hereafter.

I withdraw the pro forma motion.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I should have moved to strike out the item that the gentleman refers to as a sort of tribute to Democratic legislation, except that I think we ought to let the Clerk read the bill for a little while without much discussion and see if we can not make some progress on the bill. I am sure if the motion to strike out this paragraph should be made we would waste a good deal of time in discussing it and would not accomplish anything if we struck it out. Whether it is in or out does not make any difference, except that, being in the bill, it reflects upon Democrats being successful in passing the Clayton bill. I hope that remark will not provoke discussion.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let the Clerk read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In all, National Training School for Boys, $49,276.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the sundry civil bill (H. R. 21318) and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks on the subject of the great emancipator's speech at Gettysburg.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on the subject of the great emancipator's speech at Gettysburg. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FALCONER. Mr. Speaker, in the early hours of to-day's session the Members of the House had the privilege of listening to two very eloquent and touching speeches on Abraham Lincoln. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a speech delivered before a joint session of the Legislature of the State of Washington one year ago to-day by the Hon. Will H. Thompson, of Seattle, on the subject of Abraham Lincoln, and also to place in the RECORD some extracts from a speech of Dr. L. L. West, of Everett, State of Washington.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Washington asks unanimous consent to print in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a speech made before the joint session of the Washington Legislature one year ago to-day by Will H. Thompson, and also some excerpts from a speech made by Dr. West, of Everett, Wash. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I think I shall not object, although I do not want anybody throughout the country who is an orator to think that thereby he can make a speech before some home club on the subject of Lincoln and get it inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, because there are too many gentlemen engaged in that thing.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I object.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 7555. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Suwanee River, in the State of Florida; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 16896. An act for the relief of Col. Richard H. Wilson, United States Army;

H. R. 9584. An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to sell the present old post office and the site thereof in the city of Jersey City, N. J.; and

H. R. 18783. An act to increase the limit of cost of the United States post-office building and site at St. Petersburg, Fla.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Saturday, February 13, 1915, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

SENATE.

SATURDAY, February 13, 1915.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we give Thee the worship of our lives. We would glorify the service that we render to our fellow men by giving it in Thy name and through Thy grace. Amid all human conflict of opinion, which serves to winnow the true from the false, there slowly arises the perfect product of Thy grace and of Thy providence expressed in character and in spirit. So we pray that in the daily discipline of life which comes to us in all the conflict of interest and opinion there may yet arise in us the product of God's great purpose, purifying character, strengthening and ennobling life, and bringing each one of us to the point of largest and divinest service. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire merely to give a notice. On Thursday last, when the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] gave notice of his so-called amendment to the standing rules, I made a point of order that it was not an amendment to the standing rules, but a proposal to suspend a rule for a specific purpose. The Chair very properly stated that that point of order would come up properly when the amendment came before the Senate. On yesterday when it came before the Senate, as we all know, an amendment was offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], which, of course, is not obnoxious to the point of order I made. I merely wish to give notice that I reserve that point of order to be made whenever the amendment of the Senator from Missouri comes before the Senate.

DECLARATION OF LONDON.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, while I am on my feet I ask that there may be printed in conjunction with my remarks the two orders made in the British Privy Council relating to the adoption of the declaration of London. They are very brief, comprising only two or three pages each. There is the order adopted on the 20th of August and another adopted on the 29th of October. I think it would be very useful to have them printed in the RECORD.

I may add, Mr. President, as we had some discussion on that point when I was speaking on Thursday, there are over 100 pages here of the orders in council establishing prize courts and the rules to be observed. Of course that I do not ask to have printed, but only the two brief orders in regard to the declaration of London, and I will ask that the Official Reporters may prepare them for the RECORD. I will say, Mr. President, that these are the only copies I know of; they belong to the Congressional Library, and they must be taken good care of.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator be kind enough to state what the publications are entitled, in case anyone wishes to obtain them from the library?

Mr. LODGE. One is the Manual of Emergency Legislation, published by authority. The other is Supplement No. 2 to the Manual of Emergency Legislation. It embraces all the legislation by Parliament and all the orders of council relating to the war.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

DECLARATION OF LONDON—THE DECLARATION OF LONDON ORDER IN COUNCIL, NO. 2, 1914,[1] [2] NO. 1614—AT THE COURT OF BUCKINGHAM PALACE THE 29TH DAY OF OCTOBER, 1914.

Present, the King's Most Excellent Majesty in council.

Whereas by an order in council dated the 20th day of August, 1914,[3] His Majesty was pleased to declare that during the present hostilities the convention known as the Declaration of London [4] should, subject to certain additions and modifications therein specified, be adopted and put in force by His Majesty's Government; and

Whereas the said additions and modifications were rendered necessary by the special conditions of the present war; and

Whereas it is desirable and possible now to reenact the said order in council with amendments in order to minimize, so far as possible, the interference with innocent neutral trade occasioned by the war: Now, therefore,

His Majesty, by and with the advice of his privy council, is pleased to order, and it is hereby ordered, as follows:

1. During the present hostilities the provisions of the convention known as the Declaration of London [4] shall, subject to the exclusion of the lists of contraband and noncontraband, and to the modifications hereinafter set out, be adopted and put in force by His Majesty's Government.

The modifications are as follows:

(I A neutral vessel, with papers indicating a neutral destination, which, notwithstanding the destination shown on the papers, proceeds to an enemy port, shall be liable to capture and condemnation if she is encountered before the end of her next voyage.

(II) The destination referred to in article 33 of the said declaration shall (in addition to the presumptions laid down in article 34) be presumed to exist if the goods are consigned to or for an agent of the enemy state.

(III) Notwithstanding the provisions of article 35 of the said declaration, conditional contraband shall be liable to capture on board a vessel bound for a neutral port if the goods are consigned "to order," or if the ship's papers do not show who is the consignee of the goods, or if they show a consignee of the goods in territory belonging to or occupied by the enemy.

(IV) In the cases covered by the preceding paragraph (III) it shall lie upon the owners of the goods to prove that their destination was innocent.

2. Where it is shown to the satisfaction of one of His Majesty's principal secretaries of state that the enemy Government is drawing supplies for its armed forces from or through a neutral country, he may direct that in respect of ships bound for a port in that country article 35 of the said declaration shall not apply. Such direction shall be notified in the London Gazette, and shall operate until the same is withdrawn. So long as such direction is in force a vessel which is carrying conditional contraband to a port in that country shall not be immune from capture.

3. The order in council of the 20th August, 1914,[5] directing the adoption and enforcement during the present hostilities of the convention known as the declaration of London, subject to the additions and modifications therein specified, is hereby repealed.

4. This order may be cited as "the Declaration of London Order in Council, No. 2, 1914."

DECLARATION OF LONDON—ORDER IN COUNCIL ADOPTING, DURING THE PRESENT HOSTILITIES, THE PROVISIONS OF THE CONVENTION KNOWN AS THE "DECLARATION OF LONDON," WITH ADDITIONS AND MODIFICATIONS,[1] 1914—NO. 1260—AT THE COURT OF BUCKINGHAM PALACE, THE 20TH DAY OF AUGUST, 1914.

Present, the King's Most Excellent Majesty in council.

Whereas during the present hostilities the naval forces of His Majesty will cooperate with the French and Russian naval forces; and

Whereas it is desirable that the naval operations of the allied forces, so far as they affect neutral ships and commerce, should be conducted on similar principles; and

Whereas the Governments of France and Russia have informed His Majesty's Government that during the present hostilities it is their intention to act in accordance with the provisions of the convention known as the Declaration of London, signed on the 26th day of February, 1909,[2] so far as may be practicable.

Now, therefore, His Majesty, by and with the advice of his privy council, is pleased to order, and it is hereby ordered, that during the present hostilities the convention known as the Declaration of London shall, subject to the following additions and modifications, be adopted and put in force by His Majesty's Government as if the same had been ratified by His Majesty.

The additions and modifications are as follows:

(1) The lists of absolute and conditional contraband contained in the proclamation dated August 4, 1914,[3] shall be substituted for the lists contained in articles 22 and 24 of the said declaration.[4]

(2) A neutral vessel which succeeded in carrying contraband to the enemy with false papers may be detained for having carried such contraband if she is encountered before she has completed her return voyage.

(3) The destination referred to in article 33 may be inferred from any sufficient evidence, and, in addition to the presumption laid down in article 34, shall be presumed to exist if the goods are consigned to or for an agent of the enemy State or to or for a merchant or other person under the control of the authorities of the enemy State.

(4) The existence of a blockade shall be presumed to be known:

(a) To all ships which sailed from or touched at an enemy port a sufficient time after the notification of the blockade to the local authorities to have enabled the enemy Government to make known the existence of the blockade.

(b) To all ships which sailed from or touched at a British or allied port after the publication of the declaration of blockade.

(5) Notwithstanding the provisions of article 35 of the said declaration,[5] conditional contraband, if shown to have the destination referred to in article 33, is liable to capture to whatever port the vessel is bound and at whatever port the cargo is to be discharged.

(6) The general report of the drafting committee on the said declaration presented to the naval conference and adopted by the conference at the eleventh plenary meeting on February 25, 1909,[5] shall be considered by all prize courts as an authoritative statement of the meaning and intention of the said declaration, and such courts shall construe and interpret the provisions of the said declaration by the light of the commentary given therein.

And the lords commissioners of His Majesty's treasury, the lords commissioners of the admiralty, and each of His Majesty's principal secretaries of state, the president of the probate, divorce, and admiralty division of the high court of justice, all other judges of His Majesty's prize courts, and all governors, officers and authorities whom it may concern, are to give the necessary directions herein as to them may respectively appertain.

Senate joint memorial No. 1.

Memorial to the Congress of the United States of America petitioning the United States Government to appropriate $300,000 for suppressing carnivorous wild animals destructive to live stock in the public-land States of the West.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States:

Your memorialists, the governor and Legislature of the State of Oregon, respectfully represent that—

Whereas in the Western States, known as the public-land States, the losses of live stock and poultry, due to the attacks of coyotes, wolves, wildcats, cougars, and bears, amount to not less than $15,000,000 annually; and

Whereas in these western public-land States the State, county, and stockmen do now, and have for years, paid large bounties and used other means to bring about the eradication of these carnivorous animals; and

Whereas in these western public-land States there is now withdrawn from settlement in some form or other approximately 225,000,000 acres of Federal land, which land constitutes the principal breeding ground and refuge of these carnivorous wild animals, and enables them to increase their numbers in spite of the efforts made by the State, county, and stockmen to exterminate them: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Legislature of the State of Oregon does hereby most respectfully urge and request that Congress immediately appropriate the sum of $300,000, to be used by the United States Department of Agriculture for the destruction of coyotes, wolves, wildcats, cougars, and bears in these western public-land States, in order that the meat supply of the Nation may be increased and the proper development of the West encouraged.

Adopted by the house January 13, 1915.

BEN SELLING,
Speaker of the House.

Adopted by the senate January 13, 1915.

W. LAIR THOMPSON,
President of the Senate.

(Indorsed:) Senate joint memorial No. 1, by Senator Burgess. J. W. Cochran, chief clerk. Filed January 20, 1915, at 10.05 o'clock a. m. Ben W. Olcott, secretary of state, by S. A. Kozer, deputy.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I present a memorial of the Legislature of the State of Oregon, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Secretary of State,
By S. A. KOZER, Deputy.

House joint memorial No. 1.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

Your memorialists, the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, respectfully represent that—

Whereas the agricultural interests of the State of Oregon and of the United States of America are of most important and fundamental interest, both in magnitude and number of people employed therein; and

Whereas said interest have no adequate or suitable system of banking or finance; and

Whereas the State of Oregon, together with 34 other States of the Union and your honorable body, have sent delegates to investigate rural-credits and farm-finance systems in Europe; and

Whereas said delegates have made their respective reports urging legislative action by Congress on this subject; and

Whereas there is very urgent need on the part of the farmers and other persons interested in agricultural pursuits to take advantage of the money markets of the world in obtaining financial assistance; and

Whereas many bills have been introduced into your honorable body bearing upon this subject: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That our Representatives and Senators in Congress be, and are hereby, memoralized and requested to use their best endeavors to secure the passage of a law providing for the enactment of a rural-credit law by the terms of which the farmers of the State of Oregon may obtain long-term loans on the authorization plan and to otherwise favor the farmers and agricultural workers by allowing them to take advantage of the money markets of the world on the same terms as other industries.

Adopted by the house January 19, 1915.

BEN SELLING,
Speaker of the House.

Adopted by the senate January 21, 1915.

W. LAIR THOMPSON,
President of the Senate.

(Indorsed): House joint memorial No. 1. W. F. Drager, chief clerk. Filed January 27, 1915, at 2.20 o'clock p. m. Ben W. Olcott, secretary of state, by S. A. Kozer, deputy.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN presented a petition of sundry citizens of Oregon, praying for the establishment of an International Peace Union, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WORKS. I present a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on Pensions and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Senate joint resolution No. 4, relative to placing veterans of the United States Army who fought in Indian wars from 1865 to 1891 on the pension roll.

Whereas there is now pending in the Congress of the United States what is known as the Keating bill, providing that men who have served in the United States Army and took part in Indian campaigns between the years 1865 and 1891, shall be placed on the regular pension roll of Indian war veterans: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate and Assembly of the State of California, jointly, That the Senators and Representatives in Congress of the State of California be respectfully urged to take all proper means to expedite and secure the passage and enactment into law of the said Keating bill; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of the senate be and he is hereby directed to transmit copies of this resolution forthwith to the Senators and Representatives in Congress of the State of California.

NEWTON W. THOMPSON,
President pro tempore of the Senate.
C. C. YOUNG,
Speaker of the Assembly.

Adopted in senate January 22, 1915.

EDWIN F. SMITH,
Secretary of the Senate.

Adopted in assembly January 27, 1915.

L. B. MALLORY,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

This resolution was received by the governor this 28th day of January, A. D. 1915, at 3 o'clock p. m.

ALEXANDER MCCABE,
Private Secretary of the Governor.

Attest:

FRANK C. JORDAN,
Secretary of State.

Mr. WORKS presented petitions of sundry citizens of Los Angeles and San Luis Obispo, in the State of California, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the exportation of ammunition, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented the petition of J. R. Cunningham of San Francisco, Cal., praying for the adoption of certain amendments to the present homestead laws, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. NELSON presented petitions of sundry citizens of Minnesota, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the exportation of ammunition, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BRISTOW presented memorials of sundry citizens of Harper County, Sylvan Grove, Bird City, and Minor, all in the State of Kansas, remonstrating against curtailing the freedom of the press, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Paola and Hillsboro, in the State of Kansas, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the exportation of ammunition, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Topeka, Kans., praying for the enactment of legislation to grant pensions to civil-service employees, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. LODGE. I present two telegrams in the nature of memorials. They are very brief. I ask that they may be read and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

There being no objection, the telegrams were read and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, as follows:

ROXBURY, MASS, February 13, 1915.

Hon. H. C. LODGE,
Washington, D. C.:

Post office clerks Boston protest biennial promotions for clerks as present in Post Office appropriation bill. Please consider.

J. H. WATERS,
President National Federated Post Office Clerks, Boston.

BOSTON, MASS., February 12, 1915.

Senator HENRY C. LODGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The following resolution was adopted at a meeting of Branch 34, National Association of Letter Carriers, held in the American House February 12, 1915, and the members would respectfully ask that you lend your best efforts to the defeat of the proposed measure:

"Whereas Branch 34, National Association of Letter Carriers, has been notified that the Senate Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads will recommend to the Senate the adoption of biennial promotions for letter carriers; and

"Whereas the letter carriers in this city now serving in the $900, $1,000, and $1,100 grades served over five years as substitute letter carriers at less than a proper living wage; and

"Whereas practically all of these men served one year or more in the $600 grade; and

"Whereas under the present laws these men will serve 11 years before reaching the maximum or $1,200 grade: Be it

"Resolved, That Branch 34, National Association of Letter Carriers, disapprove of biennial promotions."

CORNELIUS F. MALLEY,
Secretary Branch 34, National Association of Letter Carriers, Roxbury Station, Boston, Mass.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I present three telegrams in the nature of memorials from clerks and letter carriers of the State of Illinois, which I ask may be read.

There being no objection, the telegrams were read, as follows:

CHICAGO, ILL., February 12, 1915.

Senator L. Y. SHERMAN,
Washington, D. C.:

We, the executive board of Local No. 1, National Federation of Post Office Clerks, in behalf of our members, protest most emphatically against recommendations of Post Office and Post Roads Committee of the Senate that promotions in the automatic grades be made biennial instead of annually, as at present, and we hope you will use your best endeavor to prevent the present classification from being amended in that respect.

Respectfully,

EXECUTIVE BOARD OF LOCAL NO. 1,
219 South Dearborn Street, Room 735.

CHICAGO, ILL., February 13, 1915.

Hon. LAWRENCE Y. SHERMAN,
Washington, D. C.:

The letter carriers of Pullman Station protest against the proposed amendments changing Post Office appropriation bill deferring increase of pay for two years or more for carriers.

Yours, respectfully,

C. F. NORLIN,
Executive Board Member, Garden City Branch, No. 11, Chicago.

CHICAGO, ILL., February 13, 1915.

Hon. L. Y. SHERMAN,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.:

The carriers of Canal Station, Chicago post office, are desirous of having you protest against the passage of an amendment to the Post Office bill against biennial promotions. The long siege of subbing is in itself a suffering and hardship, and one who goes through such usually is in debt, and this will entail another year or two of close living, the present high cost of which makes it almost impossible to exist on the present salary. We believe you are well aware of the hardship endured, also the length of time consumed to reach the lowest grade, and should the amendment pass there will be no willing men of good character and ability seeking the position. Again requesting you to do your utmost to defeat its passage, we are,

Yours, respectfully,

CARRIERS OF CANAL POSTAL STATION.
CHAS. ROLAND,
Ex-Board Member, Carriers' Postal Station.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I desire to present a telegram addressed to my colleague [Mr. TOWNSEND] and myself, which I desire to have read.

There being no objection, the telegram was read, as follows:

CONVENTION HALL,
Grand Rapids, Mich., February 12, 1915.

Hon. WM. ALDEN SMITH and
Hon. CHARLES E. TOWNSEND,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Republican State convention to-day unanimously commends your attitude opposing the attempt of the administration to force upon our people the iniquitous ship-purchasing bill.

D. E. ALWARD, Secretary.

Mr. GRONNA. I present a telegram in the nature of a memorial, and, as it is very brief, I ask that it be printed in the RECORD without reading.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GRAND FORKS, N. DAK., February 12, 1915.

A. J. GRONNA,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

One hundred postal clerks in North Dakota respectfully ask you to oppose the change from annual to biennial promotions for men in the service.

CARL H. FODNES,
President Grand Forks Branch, R. M. A.

Mr. JONES. I present a telegram in the nature of a memorial from 150 postal clerks of the Spokane branch of the Railway Mail Service, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPOKANE, WASH., February 12, 1915.

Hon. W. L. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

SIR: One hundred and fifty postal clerks of Spokane branch ask you to oppose the change from annual to biennial promotions in the Railway Mail Service.

Respectfully, JAMES R. HARPER,
President Spokane Branch, Railway Mail Service.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I present telegrams in the nature of memorials from 200 railway postal clerks of the Lincoln district, from members of the Capital City Branch, of Lincoln, and from the State president of the National Association of Letter Carriers, of Lincoln, Nebr., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LINCOLN, NEBR., February 11, 1915.

Hon. G. M. HITCHCOCK,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Two hundred railway postal clerks in Lincoln district respectfully ask you to oppose the change from annual to biennial promotions just recommended by Senate committee.

EARL M. HIATT,
President Lincoln Branch, Railway Postal Clerks' Association.

LINCOLN, NEBR., February 11, 1915.

Senator GILBERT M. HITCHCOCK,
Washington, D. C.:

The members of Capital City Branch, No. 8, National Association of Letters Carriers, representing 63 carriers, request your support in assisting to defeat bill providing for biennial promotion of letter carriers.

C. B. HALL, Secretary.

LINCOLN, NEBR., February 11, 1915.

Senator GILBERT M. HITCHCOCK,
Washington, D. C.:

As State president of the National Association of Letter Carriers I respectfully petition you to use your influence in defeating biennial promotions of carriers.

Yours, truly, J. HOMER CLARK, President.

Mr. STERLING presented petitions of sundry citizens of Rapid City, Burke, Wetora, Eureka, and Frankfort, all in the State of South Dakota, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the exportation of ammunition, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

OCEAN TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have two brief articles from the Boston News Bureau, a well-known trade journal, relating to ocean transportation. I ask that they may be read; they are very brief.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was read, as follows:

Boston: Steamship officials are at a loss to understand the telegram from Collector Billings made public Tuesday by Secretary McAdoo to the effect that there is a great lack of ship bottoms for the export trade at Boston; that booking for shipping space must be made two or three weeks in advance; and that grain elevators and railroad cars are filled with grain awaiting foreign shipment. In the ordinary course of business bookings are made two or three weeks and even much longer in advance of sailing, especially on lines whose service is only fortnightly, but the Cunard Line booked freight Tuesday for their Liverpool sailing next week and have plenty of room for their London sailing the following week.

On Tuesday three ships of companies controlled by the International Mercantile Marine Co. sailed from Boston carrying 35,000 tons of cargo, which cleaned up practically every pound of freight on hand for shipment by these lines.

The Boston & Albany grain elevator on Tuesday held only 561,719 bushels and there were 34 cars containing 38,000 bushels of grain being delivered at the elevator. As this elevator has held in the past 882,000 bushels, it is obviously not true that it is filled with grain.

Boston. A State Street banker in close touch with the shipping situation says: "It is greatly to be regretted that the exigencies of politics forced so excellent a business man as Collector Billings to send a telegram to the Secretary of the Treasury, advertising to the world a shortage in tonnage at the port of Boston. Of course there has been no shortage in tonnage here in Boston, as the collector could easily have determined had he made the slightest investigation. It is regrettable that politics obliges men to do things which their business judgment must condemn.

"Even if true, no one would be warranted in advertising that the port of Boston lacks facilities for handling shipments to Europe. Such a representation is sure to result in a curtailment of shipments through Boston and not only injure the steamship companies running to Boston but also the port itself.

"The collector is quoted as saying that the situation will be more congested 'unless relieved by increased service.' It is to be regretted that Mr. Billings did not go further and explain how the increased service would relieve the congestion at European ports due to the war. Cases of a month's delay in getting facilities and men to unload cargo at Liverpool and other ports are not unusual, and how increased service to such ports would lessen the congestion already existing there is difficult to understand.

"It can hardly be questioned but that steamship service to German ports, among others, has been affected by the war, and that, for a dozen different reasons, steamship rates to Europe have advanced. But the point at issue, in spite of the activity of the Secretary of the Treasury, is whether the ship-purchase bill would relieve existing conditions. The Government's purchasing ships already employed in steamship service would not in itself increase that service, and if the Government did purchase such ships at exorbitant prices, the mere fact of Government operation would not increase their capacity, nor would it relieve congestion on the other side or terminate the war."

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11927) for the relief of Matthew McDonald, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, which was agreed to.

Mr. OWEN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 221) withholding from allotment the unallotted lands or public domain of the Creek Nation or tribe of Indians and providing for the sale thereof, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report (No. 981) thereon.

Mr. LANE. I am directed by the Committee on Fisheries, to which was referred the bill (S. 5283) to regulate the catching of whales in the waters of the Territory of Alaska, to submit an adverse report (No. 982) thereon, and I ask that the bill be postponed indefinitely.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be postponed indefinitely.

SCHOOL BUILDINGS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. HOLLIS. From the Committee on the District of Columbia I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (H. R. 13222) to regulate the use of public-school buildings and grounds in the District of Columbia.

This bill was introduced in the Senate and in the House of Representatives at the same time. It was passed unanimously by the Senate, but when it went to the House of Representatives, instead of passing the Senate bill they passed the House bill. It makes no difference in legislation, except that the bill will have to be again passed in one House or the other. I therefore ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, when this bill was previously before the Senate there were objections to it. I should very much prefer to read the bill and see if those objectionable parts are still in it. For that reason I object to its present consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 7647) to provide for the erection of a public building at Price, Utah; to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. GRONNA:

A bill (S. 7648) to authorize an exchange of lands with the State of North Dakota for promotion of experiments in dry-land agriculture, and for other purposes (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. PERKINS:

A bill (S. 7649) providing for the disposal of certain lands in Imperial County, Cal., and the proceeds arising therefrom (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. GOFF:

A bill (S. 7650) granting an increase of pension to Adelphia Eskey (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BURLEIGH:

A bill (S. 7651) granting an increase of pension to Stillman Choate; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. ASHURST:

A bill (S. 7652) providing for the continuance of the Joint Commission to Investigate Indian Affairs; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. McCUMBER submitted an amendment proposing to increase the appropriation for the maintenance of the Glacier National Park, Mont., from $40,000 to $100,000, intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill (H. R. 21318) which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing for a refund of sums paid for documentary stamps, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill (H. R. 21318) which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. OWEN submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $812.60 to pay Frank Carpenter for services and team hire in 1910 and 1911 in connection with the construction of the Oklahoma State Rifle Range at Chandler, Okla., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Army appropriation bill (H. R. 20347), which was ordered to be printed and, with accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—LEWIS M. MILLER.

On motion of Mr. BURTON, it was Ordered, That the papers in the bill for the relief of Lewis M. Miller (S. 3128, 63d Cong.) be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report thereon having been made.

RIVER AND HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. BURTON. I submit a resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 541), as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested and directed to transmit to the Senate a statement of the balances to the credit of the respective river and harbor projects of the country now under improvement, remaining unexpended and available on January 1, 1915, or February 1, 1915, as may be most convenient.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. I ask that the resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over under the rule.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, this is the usual order made at this time in regard to balances remaining unexpended for river and harbor work. A similar resolution passed in the last Congress. It asks for information of great value to the Senate in any discussion of the river and harbor bill. It requires some little time for the preparation of the information in the War Department, and I understand they have already commenced to compile the figures, so that, perhaps, the report can be made in a short time.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. Mr. President, I have no objection especially to the resolution, but it is difficult for Senators on this side to obtain unanimous consent, and so I think it had better take the regular course.

Mr. BURTON. I understand, then, that the Senator from Tennessee asks that the resolution go over for the day?

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. Yes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over and be printed.

SHIPS OF BELLIGERENT NATIONS.

Mr. BURTON. I submit a resolution which I desire to have read, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 542), as follows:

Whereas the pending ship-purchase bill, being S. 6856, contemplates by certain of its provisions the purchase of shipping tonnage already constructed, and therefore suggests the possible acquisition of ships belonging to belligerents, some of which are interned in American and other ports as the result of the war; and

Whereas the purchase of such vessels would raise questions of vital importance to the interests of the United States, a knowledge of which is of supreme importance in order that the Senate may reach an intelligent conclusion as to the advisability of enacting said bill and as to the propriety of incorporating in its provisions certain amendments: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested, and is hereby directed, to transmit, at his earliest convenience, to the Senate of the United States information responsive to the following queries:

First. Has the Secretary of the Treasury knowledge that any officer of the Government has made overtures or addressed inquiries to the owners of ships under the flags of belligerent nations, including those ships now detained in ports of the United States or other neutral ports, with a view to the purchase of such ships on the part of the Government of the United States or any of its authorized agencies?

Second. Have tenders of sale of any merchant ship or ships carrying the flag of any of the belligerent nations been made to the United States or any of its officers or agencies?

Third. Have there been any tenders for the sale of vessels at present carrying the flag of any neutral nation to the United States or any responsible officer or agent thereof?

Fourth. Is it within the knowledge of the Secretary of the Treasury that any individual, firm, or corporation in the United States has made loans or advances to any individual, firm, or corporation owning ships which are detained in the ports of the United States or elsewhere to avoid the consequences of war; or that any person, firm, or corporation, acting either in private capacity or that of agent for the Government, holds an option on any such ship or ships contemplating their transfer either to the Government of the United States, an agency thereof, or to private citizens of the United States?

Fifth. Is it within the knowledge of the Secretary of the Treasury that the Government of the United States, or any official thereof, has in his employ or under his direction any person or agent who is making inquiry as to the possibility of purchasing any ship or ships of any description whatsoever contemplating their eventual transfer to the United States or an agency thereof?

In each of the above instances the names of the persons, ships, and terms involved in each contemplated sale or purchase is requested.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask that that resolution go over.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask that the resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over under the rule.

PURCHASE OF SHIPS.

Mr. BURTON. I submit a resolution and ask that it be read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The resolution (S. Res. 543) was read and referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators be appointed by the Presiding Officer of the Senate with authority to compel the production of books and papers, summon witnesses, and take testimony in order to ascertain:

1. Whether any individual, firm, or corporation in the United States has made loans or advances to any individual, firm, or corporation owning ships which are detained in the ports of the United States or elsewhere to avoid the consequences of war.

2. Whether any individual, firm, or corporation in the United States has at any time obtained options upon any such ship or ships.

3. Whether the persons, firms, or corporations having made such loans or obtained such options have any connection, direct or indirect, with the Government of the United States.

WATER-POWER SITES.

Mr. BORAH. I submit a resolution for which I ask immediate consideration; and I desire to say just a word in explanation of the resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 544) was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate with all information in his possession as to the ownership and control of the water-power sites in the United States, showing what proportion of such water-power sites is in private ownership and by what companies and corporations such sites in private ownership are owned and controlled; what horsepower has been developed and what proportion of it is owned and controlled by such private companies and corporations; and any facts bearing upon the question as to the existence of a monopoly in the ownership and control of hydroelectric power in the United States.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, this resolution is directed to the Secretary of Agriculture. Ordinarily it would not go there; but I am informed that the Bureau of Forestry is in possession of some very important information with regard to this matter, and that that bureau would be glad to furnish the information if it were given the opportunity to do so. For that reason the resolution is directed to the Secretary of Agriculture.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

The resolution was agreed to.

THE PREFERENTIAL BALLOT.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, Order of Business 333 on the calendar being Senate resolution 320, provides for the printing of an address by Prof. Lewis Jerome Johnson, of Harvard University. I desire to substitute a corrected copy of that address.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I think that copy should go to the Committee on Printing rather than have it substituted on the floor of the Senate. I do not think a reference would interfere at all with the desire of the Senator from Oklahoma or with the address being printed, if there is nothing in it to which there could be objection.

Mr. OWEN. This matter is on the calendar. It is an address by Prof. Johnson on the preferential ballot, and he has corrected it. I desire to have the corrected copy printed instead of the old copy.

Mr. SMOOT. I understood that was the request of the Senator, but I should prefer to have it referred to the Committee on Printing and allow the committee to act on it. I do not think there will be any objection on the part of the committee to reporting the corrected address as a substitute for the one originally proposed to be printed. I do not believe, however, it is proper to have the substitution made on the floor of the Senate. I will say to the Senator from Oklahoma that, as a member of the committee, I should have no objection to the substitution.

Mr. OWEN. I do not want the resolution to lose its place on the calendar.

Mr. SMOOT. It will not lose its place.

Mr. OWEN. Then I am quite content to have that course taken—to have the matter of the substitution of the corrected address for the old address referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the proper course.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The address will be referred to the Committee on Printing for action.

TENNESSEE RIVER BRIDGE, ALABAMA.

Mr. WHITE I ask unanimous consent to take up for immediate consideration the bill (H. R. 17168) to authorize the North Alabama Traction Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Tennessee River at or near Decatur, Ala. It is a matter of very great concern to the people in that vicinity.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MAJ. JOHN O. SKINNER.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 2789, being Order of Business No. 805, to award the medal of honor to Maj. John O. Skinner, surgeon, United States Army, retired. I feel sure there will be no objection. If there is, I will withdraw the request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to award the medal of honor to Maj. John O. Skinner, surgeon, United States Army, retired, for gallantry in action while serving as an acting assistant surgeon, United States Army, in having rescued a wounded soldier who lay under a close and heavy fire during the assault on the Modoc stronghold during the battle of January 17, 1873, in the Lava Beds, Oreg., after two soldiers had unsuccessfully attempted to make the rescue and both had been wounded in doing so.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. SHIVELY submitted the following conference report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 19545) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 12, 13, 25, 33.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, and agree to the same.

BENJAMIN F. SHIVELY,
CHARLES F. JOHNSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
ISAAC R. SHERWOOD,
J. A. ADAIR,
J. N. LANGHAM,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. SHIVELY submitted the following conference report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 20562) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 5.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, and agree to the same.

BENJAMIN F. SHIVELY,
CHARLES F. JOHNSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
ISAAC R. SHERWOOD,
J. A. ADAIR,
J. N. LANGHAM,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 6980) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

Mr. SHIVELY. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House, request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to, and the Vice President appointed Mr. SHIVELY, Mr. JOHNSON, and Mr. SHERMAN conferees on the part of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 7213) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

Mr. SHIVELY. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House, request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. SHIVELY, Mr. JOHNSON, and Mr. SHERMAN conferees on the part of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 7402) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

Mr. SHIVELY. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House, request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. SHIVELY, Mr. JOHNSON, and Mr. SHERMAN conferees on the part of the Senate.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day, which will be stated.

The resolution (S. Res. 537), submitted by Mr. GORE on the 5th instant, was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce is hereby discharged from further consideration of S. 7552.

Mr. GORE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SMOOT. What is the resolution, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Let it be reported again.

Mr. GORE. I withdraw the request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again report the resolution.

Mr. GORE. I withdraw the request.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 537, by Mr. GORE:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce is hereby discharged from further consideration of S. 7552.

Mr. PENROSE. What is "S. 7552"?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. What is the subject matter of the bill?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the title of the bill.

The SECRETARY. Senate bill 7552 is entitled:

A bill to authorize the United States, acting through a shipping board, to subscribe to the capital stock of a corporation to be organized under the laws of the United States or of a State thereof or of the District of Columbia, to purchase, construct, equip, maintain, and operate merchant vessels in the foreign trade.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will ask if that resolution was presented at a former meeting of the Senate? If not, of course it will go over under the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Oh, yes; it has been heretofore presented. It was presented on the 5th of February, and laid over under the rule.

Mr. GALLINGER. It was laid over under the rule?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. Then it is in order.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, is that resolution in order at this time?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is, at this time.

Mr. BURTON. I desire to address the Senate on this matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oklahoma has been recognized. Will he yield?

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I desire to ask for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the motion.

Mr. BURTON. Well, wait, Mr. President. I should like to be heard.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Under the ruling of the Senate it does not make the slightest difference whether the yeas and nays are ordered or not. Is the demand for the yeas and nays seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I may be under a misapprehension. As I understand, this is a resolution to discharge the Committee on Commerce from the further consideration of that bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Is not that bill out of the hands of the Committee on Commerce and before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. This is a different bill, as the Chair understands. The Senator from Ohio is now recognized.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. BURTON. I should like to ask for what purpose the Senator from Arizona desires me to yield?

GRAZING HOMESTEAD BILL.

Mr. ASHURST. I rose to obtain recognition, but the Chair properly recognized the Senator from Ohio. I wanted at some time to-day, and I give notice that I am going to repeat this attempt until I shall have succeeded or failed, to ask the Senate to vote on the grazing homestead bill. The entire western part of the United States, so far as I am advised, is strongly in favor of this grazing homestead bill. The bill has passed the House of Representatives. It was favorably reported from the Senate Committee on Public Lands. Here is a noble opportunity for this Congress to do something in behalf of the people. So I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of H. R. 15799, the grazing homestead bill.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I desire to be heard on the so-called ship-purchase bill; but if it is distinctly understood that at the time the Senator from Arizona concludes, or at the time the Senate concludes the consideration of his motion in regard to a homestead bill, I shall have the floor, I shall be glad to yield to him.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I am just advised, and I presume that is true, that the motion is not in order until the morning business is closed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me further?

Mr. BURTON. For what purpose?

Mr. ASHURST. I wish to ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the grazing homestead bill, H. R. 15799, which bill has passed the House of Representatives and has a unanimous report in its favor from the Senate Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I again say that if it is distinctly understood that this is not to deprive me of the privilege of proceeding immediately upon the conclusion of the consideration of this bill I shall be glad to yield to the Senator from Arizona, but not under any other circumstances whatever. I am ready to proceed. I understand that bill is a very commendable one, and I have no objection to its consideration, but I waive no rights to the floor.

Mr. JONES. Regular order, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection to the present consideration of the bill referred to by the Senator from Arizona?

Mr. SMOOT. I object.

Mr. BURTON. There is an objection, as I understand.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio at last has the floor.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, the ship-purchase bill has assumed a very peculiar position of late. The question most prominently before the Senate is one of the rules. There are two propositions pending; and in the hope that out of all the confusion which has arisen we may get a better understanding of the question at issue, I desire to make a brief review of the present situation.

There is pending before the Senate a motion by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] to refer certain propositions for amendments to the standing rules of the Senate, temporary or permanent, to the Committee on Rules. The question originally intended to be referred is a motion by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], which I will read. It is found on page 3627 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

> Pursuant to the provisions of Rule XI of the standing rules of the Senate, I propose the following amendment to the rules:
> Add, at the end of Rule XXII of the standing rules of the Senate, the following:
> "Not later than the hour of 2 o'clock p. m. of the calendar day February 19, 1915, all debate upon Senate bill 6856 shall cease, and at the time aforesaid the Senate shall proceed to vote upon said bill and all amendments thereto without further debate. The final vote upon said bill shall be taken not later than 5 o'clock p. m. of said date.
> "The foregoing proceedings shall have precedence over all other motions whatsoever."

To this motion the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] on yesterday proposed an amendment, which is found on page 3630 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, in the first column, and reads as follows:

> That the committee be instructed—

That is, the Committee on Rules—

> RULE XLI. It shall be in order during the morning hour to make a motion that any bill or resolution then on the calendar shall be considered under the terms of this rule. Such motion, when made, shall lie over one day and shall then be decided without debate. When it has been decided to consider a bill or resolution under this rule the same shall first be considered in general debate, during which time no Senator, except by unanimous consent, shall be allowed to speak more than three hours. At the close of general debate the bill or resolution shall be read for amendments, and on any amendment that may be offered no Senator, except by unanimous consent, shall speak for more than 15 minutes: Provided, That any Senator who has not spoken for three hours in general debate shall in addition to said 15 minutes be allowed additional time, but in no case shall such additional time or times, including the time used by such Senator in general debate, exceed in the aggregate three hours. When the bill is being read for amendment all debate shall be confined to the amendment which is then pending.

We have thus before us two propositions very distinct and very easily discriminated. One is a rule intended to be applied to a single bill now before the Senate of the United States. It is proposed in effect to suspend the rules and provide for cloture on one measure. If this resolution should be adopted it would be functus officio, it would have no force or effect beyond this one bill which is pending. In a word, it provides for a temporary suspension of the rules. The other is in the nature of an amendment to the rules. It can be adopted, no doubt, by a majority vote of the Senate. It provides a very radical change in the procedure and methods of the Senate which have prevailed for more than 100 years.

At this time I do not wish to go into any elaborate discussion of the question relating to the rules of the Senate under which unlimited debate is allowed, but I do wish to express myself briefly upon this subject. Personally, I should favor some rule under which unlimited debate can be brought to an end, but I do not see my way clear to favor a proposition under which this can be done by a mere majority vote. It is a question of detail whether two-thirds, or three-fourths, or four-fifths, or any larger fraction should be required.

There are possibilities in a filibuster which would not contribute to the orderly procedure of the Senate and to our usefulness as a legislative body; but there is another side to this question. When the Senate of the United States was first organized, for eight years the previous question was allowed. At the expiration of that time the rules were changed; and since then, now for 117 years, unlimited debate has been allowed in this body. I think the right of unlimited debate is one of the bulwarks of the American Nation to prevent injudicious legislation, and that it is also a safeguard for the liberty and rights of the American people.

The great problem of popular government is to secure the rights of the minority. The principle was laid down by Mr. Webster, in his reply to Calhoun, that there was so far a common interest imposed upon all the people of a country that the majority could rule without injustice or oppression to the parts. That great fundamental idea is based upon the principle that the right of government must rest somewhere. It might rest with the king, with absolute power; it might rest with an aristocracy; but in popular government it rests, as we say somewhat loosely, with the people. There must be some way in which the people can express their will, and that the orderly processes of government may go on. It has been thought the majority must rule. But over against that we must bear in mind that this Government of ours is not like those of the ancient days, wherein a popular assembly issued its decree. It is not like one of those in which a single parliamentary body determines the policy of the Government. The United States Constitution provides an elaborate system of checks and balances under which it is assured with an equal degree of fixedness, first, that the people shall rule; second, that the will of the people shall be calmly and deliberately expressed. As has been stated in a phrase which possibly has a little of flippancy, "the framers of the Constitution had equal fear of the despot and of the mob."

Our Constitution provides an Executive, a legislative, and a judiciary. It has a perfect panoply of provisions to prevent injudicious or hasty action. Unlike many of the republics of the olden days there are two legislative chambers. The Executive has the right of veto. The legislative will does not become law after a veto has been transmitted with the reasons of the Executive unless both Houses of Congress by a two-thirds vote override that veto.

We had an illustration of this barely a week ago. A bill passed both the House and Senate by an overwhelming majority which was returned by the President with his veto. It goes without saying that in this body it would have passed four to one over his veto, but it first went to the other House, and on a very large vote it lacked a comparatively trivial number of the required majority. Perhaps a change of five votes would have resulted in the necessary two-thirds. But that prevented the bill from becoming a law, and that notwithstanding that in two Congresses, in the years 1896 and 1897 under the administration of President Cleveland and again under the administration of President Taft, a similar bill was passed, and notwithstanding some persons rose in the House of Representatives and said that while their personal convictions were against the bill they felt compelled to vote for it because the people demanded it.

So this is not a Government in which the idea of popular control is pushed to the extreme. I think I may say, Mr. President, that this Senate, with its right of unlimited debate, has thrown such illumination on great questions as to be a benefit which may have saved the people from mistaken action in times of excitement and passion.

The debates here, though somewhat lengthy, have aroused the attention of the people and caused them to change their minds.

And again, let us take the word "filibuster," so odious to some; what has been the history of the filibusters in the Senate?

In the year 1891 one was undertaken against the so-called force bill. It had passed the House of Representatives and was pending here in the Senate where it was thought it would command a plain majority. But a filibuster was organized against it, and it was defeated. If there had been any such rule in existence as is contemplated by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], it would have become a law.

When we look at this question calmly and dispassionately, after a lapse of 23 or 24 years, whatever the opinions of any individual among us may be, I believe that the general judgment of the American people is that the defeat of that measure was for the best.

In the year 1893 a filibuster was organized against the repeal of the silver-purchase act of 1890. The repeal of the act had been recommended by President Cleveland. A large majority in both the Senate and the House favored the repeal. Half a dozen or less conducted a very earnest filibuster against it. Considerable time was required for discussion, but the Senate and House heard from the people, and that filibuster was ineffective.

One of my predecessors from the great State of Ohio, Hon. John Sherman, here in this body uttered an impassioned appeal to the Democrats during that discussion, placing upon them the responsibility for action. Possibly in part under the influence of that appeal, made not only to his opponents but to those on his side of the Senate, the measure was passed and it became a law. But the temporary opposition called a filibuster led to an intelligent and careful consideration of the question of silver coinage in all its phases, and I think there is none who can say it was not helpful. It was a proof that if a filibuster is not sustained by popular sentiment, if it is not in the cause of right, it will fail of its purpose.

In the year 1901 Mr. Carter, of Montana, talked a river and harbor bill to death. It was a somewhat easy task, because the measure was brought before the Senate on a conference report, as I recall it, late in the evening of March 3, and there were several conference reports on appropriation bills which it was very much desired that the Senate should dispose of.

Passing on a little further, Senator Carmack, of Tennessee, by a so-called filibuster, defeated a ship-subsidy bill. Well, that also was under unusual circumstances. It was at the very close of a session which expired by limitation, as I recall it. At a later time that same question was brought before Congress, passed the Senate on two or three occasions, but failed in the House. The consistent majority of the two Houses was evidently against the measure and justified its original defeat by exceptional means.

In the year 1911 the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] conducted what may be called a filibuster—I think he will not be offended, he is here, I see, if I use that term—against the bill for joint statehood for Arizona and New Mexico. He talked all night, as I recall it, on an appropriation bill.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BURTON. I yield for a question.

Mr. OWEN. The Senator is in error with regard to the statement of the record. It was not joint statehood for Arizona and New Mexico, but was merely a question as to whether Arizona should be excluded and New Mexico admitted.

Mr. BURTON. Very well; I stand corrected on that. I was thinking of the later bill.

Mr. ROOT. It was the separate bill.

Mr. BURTON. It was the bill for the separate admission of New Mexico without Arizona.

Mr. OWEN. That is right.

Mr. BURTON. That seems to have succeeded, for now Arizona is a State and is represented here on this floor.

In the last session of this body, with a comparatively small number of my colleagues, I stood against the river and harbor bill. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], who is present, cooperated in that enterprise. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], the Senators from Nebraska, and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] aided very much.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; if it is a question merely.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It is simply this: It is of no great consequence, but I think it might well be stated correctly in the RECORD what was the filibuster of the Senator from Oklahoma. I should like the Senator from Ohio to ask the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] to make that statement. I think the Senator is incorrect in the statement of it.

Mr. FALL. I will be glad to give it.

Mr. BURTON. I do not know that I can yield for that under the rule. I do not know but that it would be better to have an error go into the RECORD which does not really affect the proceedings than to have the question of my right to the floor raised.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator yield for a question right there?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Does not the Senator think it would be better to provide by a general rule against these filibusters and save these errors from going into the RECORD, because I think the Senator will have to admit that various rulings for the last several years when filibusters have been conducted have been promulgated here on emergency propositions that in fact everybody practically knows were wrong. If it were not for the filibuster, we would not have such rulings, and under the rule the Senator from New Mexico could get the truth put in the RECORD.

Mr. BURTON. I really was not aware that such rulings had been made, unless during this discussion on the ship-purchase bill. A ruling was made when the river and harbor bill was under consideration that one holding the floor could not yield even for a question except by unanimous consent, but after a day's discussion that ruling was reversed. Speaking of the river and harbor bill, I insist that that really was not a filibuster. A river and harbor bill had passed the House and been reported to the Senate which included the accumulation of the errors of four or five years. Indeed, it was based upon erroneous principles. It included objectionable items. It failed to recognize radical changes in transportation in this country. As was pointed out during that debate by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], there was at least one improvement where it would have been more economical to have bought and burned all the freight offered than to continue the improvement. There were other items in that bill equally absurd. The subject required careful consideration, much elaboration, the reading of dry statistics, the presentation of unattractive figures, some iteration and, possibly, reiteration, so that the facts might be brought before the Senate. What was the result of that filibuster? Call it so if you have a mind to; I am not sensitive on the subject.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. An analysis of the errors of that bill made its defeat essential if we were ever to have a rational system of waterway improvements in the United States; and, Mr. President, no serious effort ever has been made to refute the facts or explain the discouraging statistics presented during that prolonged debate. I do not claim credit for the defeat of the bill, though I did talk all night against it. I merely sought to present to the Senate and to the country the plain, unvarnished facts.

What was the result? A saving of $40,000,000 to the people of the United States. I am sure there is a certain element in the country ready to vote for the retention of the right to filibuster.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BURTON. The Senator from Michigan rose first.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Oh, no.

Mr. BURTON. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. ROOT. I rose merely to ask a question of the Senator from Ohio. Was the all-night session, through which he was compelled to talk in order to present the facts to justify the defeat of the rivers and harbors bill of the last Congress anything more than an attempt to prevent him from stating those facts through the operation of physical exhaustion?

Mr. BURTON. I think not. That morning there had been a meeting of the committee, in which a compromise had been discussed. At 5 o'clock in the evening word was brought to me that all propositions for a compromise were withdrawn, and that an all-night session would be insisted upon. Of course, that meant an effort to jam the bill through that night by the weight of physical exhaustion. One Senator had said, "Keep this body in session until those Senators drop in their seats and their mouths are dry." That meant a challenge of physical endurance, a threat to carry the bill through, regardless of its merits.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BURTON. I yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I wish to ask the Senator from Ohio whether he would have undertaken the work which he did in antagonism to the river and harbor bill if there had been any form of cloture in the Senate by which a vote could have been forced by a majority of this body?

Mr. BURTON. It would have been, I take it, impossible.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to have the Senator from Ohio ask the Senator from Michigan who has just propounded the question whether the Senator from Michigan did not say on the floor of the Senate that the bill was almost perfect.

Mr. BURTON. I am a little afraid of getting into a desultory discussion here——

Mr. NORRIS. And whether the Senator from Michigan did not think that the filibuster was a bad thing?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; but if the Senator will allow me——

Mr. BURTON. I will yield, if the Senator from Michigan will ask me a question; I do not want to yield to a second Senator to ask it. The Senator from Michigan knows my fondness for him would make me gladly yield to him for 10, 20, or 30 minutes for a statement; but there are certain rules enforced here that compel me to restrict any interruption by him to an inquiry.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I realize that, Mr. President.

Mr. BURTON. If the Senator from Michigan will make it a question, I will yield.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I realize that I am not permitted to answer the question of the Senator from Nebraska, but I think I am under the rule permitted to say that the filibuster of the Senator from Ohio was not only justifiable but that I rejoice it was made, and as one of the members of the Committee on Commerce I have governed myself accordingly in the present bill in every part I have had in it; and it is twenty-odd million dollars less than the bill that was proposed and is a more wholesome piece of legislation. I thank the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. BURTON. It is not perfect yet, by a good deal.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But I thank the Senator from Ohio and I thank the absence of cloture for what he accomplished.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator from Ohio yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from Ohio if, in view of the fact that we shall probably have a deficit of $100,000,000 at the end of the present fiscal year, he does not think the Democratic Party and the whole country owe those of us who engaged in that so-called filibuster thanks?

Mr. BURTON. I think so; certainly to the Senator from New Hampshire and to the other Senators whom I mentioned, and I will put myself at the foot of the list.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator yield to me for a question?

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Ohio, I apprehend, will agree with me that if it had not been for that the deficit would have been $140,000,000 in place of $100,000,000. It is bad enough as it is.

Mr. KENYON. Will the Senator from Ohio yield for a question?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. I wish to ask the Senator from Ohio if the Senator from Michigan who has just so eloquently spoken did not in the same eloquent way announce that there was not an item in the river and harbor bill presented here the last time that ought not to be passed?

Mr. BURTON. Possibly he said something like that, but he was open to conviction on the subject, and he was convinced afterwards that that was not the case. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if the Senator from Ohio will permit me to ask a question——

Mr. POMERENE. I just want to ask one other brief question. What was the date of the conversion of the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BURTON. It was in due time.

Mr. ROOT. Just let me ask the Senator——

Mr. BURTON. I yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. ROOT. I wish to ask the Senator from Ohio whether the conversion of the Senator from Michigan was not made possible by the fact that the Senator from Michigan had been bound by no caucus rule in respect to the merits of the proposition?

Mr. BURTON. If he had been bound by a caucus rule, I am afraid he would not have been converted, and would not have uttered the very pleasant sentiments that he uttered just a few moments ago.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator from Ohio a question. It is this: Whether a statement such as has been attributed to me by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], rather appropriately, was made in view of the fact that the War Department and the engineers of the Army had made their estimates and had approved every single item in the river and harbor bill at the last session, except one which I myself introduced, and which was of no consequence. Therefore I say that as river and harbor bills have been made—I ask the Senator from Ohio if I am not correct—as river and harbor bills have been made, that was scientifically and appropriately made; but I think that the filibuster—and it was a filibuster, and a wholesome one—saved the country many millions of dollars, and should be repeated in this Chamber whenever similar tactics are pursued.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. BURTON. Excuse me just one moment. I am afraid there was too much science in the bill and too little common sense.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. There were both.

Mr. KENYON. Will the Senator from Ohio yield for a question?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. I ask this question: Does the Senator from Ohio not feel that the Senator from Michigan, before making a statement of that character and being ready to vote for the bill, should have made some slight investigation of these various contracts, especially as he was a member of the committee reporting the bill?

Mr. BURTON. I venture to say that the Senator from Michigan made the investigation that is usually made by Members. You have to go down under the upper crust into the lower strata to find the real facts. It is possible that the Senator from Michigan stopped at the upper covering or crust and did not go below that, and that at first he thought it was all right; but I am unwilling——

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly; for a question merely.

Mr. GORE. I desire to really propound my question to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT].

Mr. BURTON. The senior Senator from New York does not now have the floor.

Mr. GORE. I understand that the Senator from Ohio has the floor, but I was wondering whether he would yield to me to ask a question of the Senator from New York.

Mr. BURTON. I should be glad to do so, as the Senator from Oklahoma knows, but if the Senator from Oklahoma will present the question to me, as I am near the Senator from New York, possibly in that indirect way we can reach the desired result.

Mr. GORE. I merely wish to ask the Senator from New York whether he thinks that a party caucus ought or ought not to bind its participants?

Mr. BURTON. I am ready to answer that for the Senator from New York.

Mr. GORE. It is the opinion of the Senator from New York which I really desire in this instance.

Mr. BURTON. The Senator from New York believes that every man in this Senate is a Senator of the United States; that to bind his judgment and his conscience by a caucus held behind closed doors restrains his liberty and prevents him from performing his duty.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I should like very much to answer the question of the Senator from Oklahoma, if——

Mr. BURTON. I will yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. ROOT. If I can do so without taking the Senator from Ohio from the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Oh, it does not seem that anybody wants to take anybody off the floor.

Mr. GORE. I have no purpose of that sort.

Mr. ROOT. Then I beg leave to answer the Senator from Oklahoma. The Senator from Oklahoma asks whether the senior Senator from New York thinks that a caucus resolution should be binding?

Mr. GORE. That is the point.

Mr. ROOT. I think that to be bound by a caucus resolution, adopted in advance of the discussion of a measure in this body, is to be false to the constitutional duty of Senators and is to be false to their oath of office——

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. ROOT. I am not through yet, sir.

Mr. GORE. I beg pardon.

Mr. ROOT. Because in the Government of the United States, under the Constitution, it is the duty of the Members of the two great legislative bodies of this country to consider, to discuss, and to act, each man in accordance with his individual opinion, each man in accordance with the judgment he forms upon the arguments that are presented to the legislative body to which he belongs. Any agreement made beforehand by which Senators of the United States bind themselves not to consider, not to keep an open mind to arguments that are made upon the merits of a measure, not to vote in accordance with their individual judgment, is a violation of their oaths, is an abandonment and a negation of the constitutional Government of the United States, and is the substitution for it of an extra constitutional and unconstitutional method of government.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I appreciate the lofty sentiments of the Senator. I now desire to ask him if he thinks that the national Republican convention in Chicago, over which he presided, ought or ought not to have bound the participants in that convention?

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, we are really not discussing at this time any political question. We are debating a very important matter relating to the rules of the Senate; but I am perfectly willing, if I do not in any way prejudice my right to the floor, to yield to the Senator from New York.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I will answer the second question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Nobody is objecting, and so long as there is no objection, the Chair is not trying to enforce any of the rules of the Senate. All this is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, in my opinion, the declaration of the party platform at Chicago, equally with the declaration of all other party platforms promulgated by national conventions, performed solely the function of stating to the people of the country the attitude of the party upon the great public questions that were in the minds of the people of the country. Good faith requires that the attitude of the party as stated in the party platform shall be maintained. Beyond that obligation—that moral obligation which affects every member of the party and every member of the convention—there is no obligation; but, sir, no declaration of a party platform can absolve a man who, before or after, takes an oath of office to act as a Member of the great legislative council of the Nation from the duty to keep open-minded upon all questions that are brought before the body and to vote in accordance with the judgment that he forms upon the arguments that are presented in the discussions of the body.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. ROOT. Wait a moment. And, sir, if there ever come to be differences between the honest judgment of a Member of this body upon a question presented to the body and the declaration of a party platform, there is no doubt whatever that the oath of the legislator must prevail over the declaration of the party platform.

Mr. GORE. I did not make my point entirely clear to the Senator.

Mr. ROOT. Well, I have made mine clear, I hope.

Mr. GORE. Does the Senator think that the participants in the Chicago convention ought to have supported the nominees of that convention? That is the point.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I will not answer the question of the Senator from Oklahoma, because it is both irrelevant and impertinent.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield to me for a question?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. FALL. I should like to ask the Senator——

Mr. BURTON. I am perfectly willing to yield, provided I do not lose the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. When anybody tires of it the Chair will stop it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURTON. I will depend on the Chair.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio if the very question asked by the Senator from Oklahoma does not, to his mind, indicate the very great difference existing here in the Senate of the United States, in that some Members of the Senate confuse constitutional government with party government? Some men think that constitutional government is party government. Is not that illustrated by the very question which is asked by the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BURTON. Precisely so. When you govern the action of a political party—I do not care whether it is the majority or the minority—by party caucus, from which the public are excluded, in which a majority or two-thirds may bind the whole number, you are departing from constitutional government for party government, and party government in one of its most offensive forms.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing to segregate all constitutional questions from my inquiry, and, unless the Senator from Ohio shares the view of the Senator from New York that the question is impertinent—in which event I will not insist upon an answer to it—I should like to know if the Senator from Ohio thinks that the participants in the Chicago convention ought to have supported the nominees of that convention?

Mr. BURTON. I do not care to answer for the convictions of others; I supported them, Mr. President; but I do not care to go further into that question at this time.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, just one word more. My apology for this question, if any be needed, is the fact that both the Senator from New York and the Senator from Ohio are presidential possibilities, and I desired an expression from them upon that point, as to whether, in case the convention should nominate either one of them, they would be inclined to insist that the participants in the convention should support the nominees of the convention.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. BURTON. The Senator from Oklahoma flatters me overmuch in saying that I am, what?—a presidential possibility. But I do not care to go into any suggestion or discussion actuated by a disposition to cross-examine me in regard to my views in regard to the Chicago convention. I supported the nominees, and supported them cordially; and I shall do so again, no doubt.

Mr. GORE. With the Senator's indulgence, just one word further. I think the Republican Party might go a good deal further and do a good deal worse than to nominate the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I wish now to enter an objection to having my presidential prospects destroyed by the advocacy of the Senator from Oklahoma. [Laughter.]

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I did not understand the observation of the Senator from New York.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, in view of the manner in which this subject has come up, I should like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma, who himself is a possibility as a presidential candidate, whether he believes those who participated in the last Baltimore convention were bound to respect, advocate, and adhere to the platform adopted by that convention?

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. KENYON. I understood the Senator from Oklahoma indorsed the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] for President and not the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. [Laughter.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. Well, about everybody has been nominated now. The Senator from Ohio will proceed. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, that bill, with all its objectionable features and its extravagance, was defeated by what is called a filibuster; and I think I may say with serene confidence that if there is one legislative act of the last session of Congress to which the people of the United States gave their approval—and I include the Trade Commission bill and every other statute placed on the books—it was the defeat of that river and harbor bill. It is a monument in honor of unlimited discussion here in the Senate.

We all know how things happen. A wave of excitement goes over the country; telegrams, letters, and petitions come in here, loading the mails and the telegraph wires. Some sudden impulse is given to a measure, and it obtains support. The legislator often thinks that this is the voice of the people; but it is not. The second voice is more intelligent, based, as it is, upon the more careful and mature judgment of the people. In such a situation as this, which is happening every year, the Senate should be able to stand firm until the people are really heard from.

What will be the result, Mr. President, of such a rule as that proposed by the Senator from Nebraska, and especially what will be the result of such a rule as that proposed by the Senator from Missouri? I do not wish to be understood as opposing in its entirety the principle set forth by the Senator from Nebraska. I think there should be some limit upon the discussion which occurs here, but so safeguarded that it would be used only after the right of discussion has become abused, after we have heard from the people and know that we are in touch with their final and deliberate judgment upon any question. Why, Mr. President, it would mean dictation by the Executive; it would mean the preponderance of the very power that our forefathers in their wisdom sought to curtail.

In this connection I wish to read—and I regret the Senator from Oklahoma has not remained in the Chamber—a little discussion that occurred in the Senate during the administration of President Taft, showing the view that was taken at that time about suggestions from the Executive. The postal savings bank bill was pending. The then Senator from Colorado, Mr. Hughes, whose death we all deplore, for he was a most able Senator, was addressing the Senate when Mr. GORE rose to interrupt him:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. HUGHES. I do.

Mr. GORE. I wish to interrupt the Senator from Colorado at this point long enough to make one or two observations.

The Constitution provides that the President of the United States can communicate to Congress, in writing, his views and his recommendations with reference to desirable legislation. I am sure that everyone not only appreciates but desires that the President shall give expression to his views upon needful legislation by constitutional methods.

Mr. President, I doubt the propriety of noising it abroad about this Capitol that the President desires certain measures enacted into law by other than constitutional means.

What is the situation now? Let us have the facts as everyone knows them to be. Whenever any modification of the pending bill is proposed there is anxious waiting for the word from the White House. The senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] made the startling statement here on the floor of the Senate on Wednesday that not half of the Members on that side believed in the ship-purchase bill. That statement remains in the RECORD, sent out to the country—that half the Members on that side so consistently and persistently voting to bring up this measure and to pass it were opposed to it. It stands uncontradicted, unimpeached, acknowledged to be true, admitted, that the force behind this legislation is not the conviction of the Senate of the United States, but the will of the President of the United States.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Did not the same Senator from Nebraska in the same speech state that the two-thirds vote for the resolution in the Democratic caucus which bound it and bound all the other Democrats, as the adherents of this bill claimed, was secured by the change of one Democrat whose views were the other way?

Mr. BURTON. He did so state.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. So that one Democrat has bound the whole Democratic Party on this question.

Mr. BURTON. This position of the majority reminds me, Mr. President, of a cartoon that I saw in my boyhood, after a convention at Philadelphia which gave its support to Andrew Johnson, in which there was represented a most excellent collection of gentlemen, largely officeholders, sitting in rows, every one with a padlock on his mouth, signifying that he was bound by Executive pressure.

The Senator from Oklahoma proceeded:

It recalls an incident, I may say a glorious incident, in English history.

In 1783 what is known as Mr. Fox's East India bill passed the House of Commons. It was defeated by the House of Lords December 17, 1783. On that day George III, not unknown to American history, sent a card to Earl Temple, a member of the House of Lords, saying to him that the King would regard those who voted for the East India bill not only as not his friends but as his enemies. Immediately the House of Commons resented this royal interference, this interference on the part of the executive with the legislative part of the Government, and the House of Commons, with a spirit worthy of that body in its most glorious days, passed the following resolution, which I ask may be read to the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

"DECEMBER 17, 1783.

"To report any opinion or pretended opinion of His Majesty upon any bill or other proceeding depending in either House of Parliament with a view to influence the votes of the members is a high crime and misdemeanor, derogatory to the honor of the Crown, a breach of the fundamental privileges of Parliament, and subversive of the constitution."

"To report any opinion or pretended opinion of his majesty!" Has there been an hour since this discussion commenced when Members of the Senate have not been confronted with opinions of the President of the United States? Why, this very morning, when Members of the Senate and House have been sitting up long and consulting what to do, there is the report that the President will not stand for a certain proposition, so they have to begin all over again—as if the Senate, with its high prerogatives, had nothing to say, but the President of the United States was to decide the measures we were to pass.

When power bows to flattery and to patronage, when the Executive has such a strangle hold as he seems now to have, is a time when we Senators should discuss what are the prerogatives, the rights, and the responsibilities of this body.

Are we willing to sink into nothingness, to become mere "me-toos," or are we going to stand up and say, "Each of us is a Member of the Senate of the United States, an integral part of this great Government, and with a duty to perform to the country and his constituents, which he will perform according to the light of his own intelligence and conscience and without Executive dictation"?

That is the question here to-day. If in this time of heat and passion the rule proposed by the Senator from Missouri or that proposed by the Senator from Nebraska should pass, it would be a declaration in words that might well be written upon parchment and exposed on the walls of this Chamber: "The Senate bows down to the Executive, and allows him to control its proceedings."

This is not a time to discuss any cloture rule. This is not a time to discuss any rule for voting on Friday. It is a time to consider soberly and carefully the constitutional question whether the great balance between the three departments of government for which our ancestors fought, this greatest and best experiment in government in the tides of time, is to continue, or whether one department is to be all.

Mr. President, I am using no extravagant language. Last year a measure came before the Senate for the repeal of the act exempting American ships in the coastwise trade from toll for passing through the Panama Canal. In the year 1912—I very distinctly remember the occasion—a motion which I myself had offered in this body, to strike out that exemption, came to a vote. It is true it was in the heat of an August evening, and thereafter it was frequently said that the measure had not been carefully considered, but I do not think that is quite correct. It had been discussed by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]; we all had added our contributions to the question. What was the result on that motion? Eleven votes for it and 43 votes against it. A year ago last winter the President of the United States announced that he favored the repeal of that exemption. He had not taken that position in the preceding campaign. He had taken exactly the contrary position—that our boats should be exempt from tolls, and he had used some expression in regard to the platform not being "molasses to catch flies." In the most unequivocal terms he had favored that exemption on the stump when a candidate for the presidential office and when the people were making up their minds how to vote. But a year ago last winter he changed his mind. Most decidedly do I say, Mr. President, that I think his second conclusion was right. I could not with consistency say otherwise, because in the Hall of the other House on the 1st of May, 1900, I took a stand in favor of the neutralization of the Panama Canal or the Nicaragua Canal at the time when it was an enterprise in embryo and the route undecided. I had frequent conversations with Mr. Hay, then Secretary of State, and I know that his idea was that there should be equal treatment of all vessels passing through that canal. Strangely, in all the conversations there never was a reference to the exceptional position of coastwise shipping, and I should make the statement with that reservation; but I am sure when the treaties with Great Britain, called the first and second Hay-Pauncefote treaties, were framed it was his idea to have equal treatment for the ships of all nations. I could take no other stand after that experience. So when the bill came from the House with an exemption I promptly made a motion to strike it out, which was defeated disastrously by a vote of about four to one, as I have said.

Mr. President, I have every reason to suppose that except for Executive action that exemption would be in the law to-day. The President of the United States, however, took a hand in it, and every one within the sound of my voice knows how strong that pressure was. I approve, Senators, the conclusion reached; but I would that it had been reached in some other way, namely, by the untrammeled action of the Senate and of the House of Representatives. Indeed, it is a question whether it is not better for the representatives of the people to work out these problems in their own way, even if once in a while mistakes are made; for it is the whole theory of popular government, not that the highest degree of efficiency can be attained—if we wanted that, perhaps we would have an absolute monarchy or an aristocracy—but that the whole political and social fabric is made stronger and better if every citizen has a part in the government. The thought is that even his mistakes and errors, the deficiencies of the individual citizen, will lead to ultimate good.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. BURTON. I shall be glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Does not the Senator remember that when the Senate took that action upon the proposition of exempting American vessels in the coastwise trade from tolls while passing through the Panama Canal, previously to that and before the bill had come to debate at all upon the floor of the Senate, the Democratic national convention had bound all its members to the exemption?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; that is true. If I were to write a history of that period I do not know but that I would say that but for that unfortunate declaration in the Baltimore platform—for I think it unfortunate—the exemption provision in the House bill might have been stricken out. I remember addressing the Senate before that clause in the platform was generally understood, and certain Senators on the other side certainly, by their questions and by their interruptions, approved the repeal of the exemption, although they afterwards voted against it.

Now, Mr. President, to resume reading this most remarkable discussion here—most remarkable in view of what has happened recently:

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I sometimes think that circumstances justify a similar proceeding here, and that the dignity of the Senate and the dignity of the House require the adoption of such a resolution. The Senator from Colorado is in no wise responsible for the presentation of this resolution. I present it on my own responsibility, and I apologize to him for the interruption; but this resolution was adopted by the English Parliament and it was characterized by the same spirit which inspired the British Parliament and the British people when they snatched the jewel of liberty from the iron hand of tyranny.

How preposterous it sounds, in view of the dictation of the White House at this time, to talk about "snatching the jewel of liberty from the iron hand of tyranny," when half of the Senators on that side tacitly admit that they are not in favor of this bill, but they are going to vote for it because the President stubbornly stands out.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, I contend that no apology is ever necessary for calling the attention of a representative body of legislators to the true dignity of their position and the full measure of their constitutional powers and rights.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BURTON. I do.

Mr. FLETCHER. I simply wanted to inquire of the Senator by what sort of authority he made the statement that half the Senators on this side were not in favor of this measure?

Mr. BURTON. Because the challenge was thrown out to you here a few days ago by the most remarkable statement made by the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]. I have here the exact words that he used; the statement can be found in the RECORD. It was made at a time when the attendance in the Senate was very full. It is found on page 3750 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, in the first column:

And I say it now upon the floor of this Senate solemnly as my belief that not one-half of the Senators upon the Democratic side of the Chamber believe in this bill as it is now before the Senate.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was not present when that statement was made, but had I been I do not know that I should have felt called upon to challenge it as the expression of opinion of the Senator from Nebraska, but I certainly differ materially from any such conclusion as that.

Mr. BURTON. A little later I shall refer to a custom in the Roman Senate that I wish could be brought into vogue here, which would be a test of the question whether the Senators really believe in a bill or not.

But to resume reading:

I wish it to be understood that while I find the statement I have read in other papers, in the Associated Press dispatches in substantially the same form, I would not for a moment give credence to the statement or seek to establish the correctness of those announcements, but it leads me to inquire if it could be possible that an unsigned appropriation bill is more potent in moving the judgment of Senators to the consideration and adoption of a bill than arguments and the Constitution with reference to the contents of the bill itself. It leads me to inquire whether a patriotic bill is to be expected as a result of the application of hot weather and the contents of the pork barrel combined to the conscience of United States Senators.

That was addressed to the Republican side then.

Mr. President, it can not be that the Senate is afraid—

Can it? Can it?—

I apprehend that when, in a few weeks, many of its Members shall go back to the body of their constituents to narrate the prowess with which they fought the battle of the people in this forum, and to tell how no power could terrify them, how boldly and sturdily they always did battle for the interests of their people, they will scorn to have it said that they yielded to any threat, Executive or otherwise, when they came to the determination of a measure of this sort.

I wish to defend the Senate and its high dignity from the aspersion contained in articles like that.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is the motion by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to amend Rule XXII with the amendment pending thereto. The Senator from Ohio will proceed.

Mr. BURTON (reading)—

I wish to defend the Senate and its high dignity from the aspersion contained in articles like that.

Who has risen here and defended the Senate and its high dignity from the aspersion cast upon that side by one of the most honored members of the Democratic Party, a Democrat in season and out of season? Can you afford, my Democratic friends, to allow an accusation of that kind to be made, that half of you do not believe in this bill in its form, without one of you contradicting it?

I know that in the commission of no Senator is there a release from duty because the weather is hot, or an intermission of patriotic devotion to their duty by Senators because an appropriation bill is unsigned and has not yet escaped the danger of a veto.

Naturally a postal savings-bank bill is not to be passed because of the influence of measures of that kind. Nor can I believe that because a caucus of a bare majority—a dwindling and insecure majority, if a majority at all—in one body of Congress shall make a hard-and-fast declaration of its position, that argument and amendment are out of place in this legislative body, and that it is compelled complacently and humbly to accept that which is brought to its attention without the privilege of an amendment and without, in fact, consideration of any character whatever.

Then he closes this part of the discussion by saying:

If legislation can not be conducted in England in the closet of the King, I submit it ought not to be conducted in the little legislative school, as the papers have dubbed it, which is now and then instructed by the Chief Executive of this country. Of course I do not expect there will be any confession or boasting with regard to that matter here, but we may turn from these asserted moving and controlling reasons to the terms of the bill itself to see if in them we can find anything which can be called a justification for the changes which we have observed. I say that I can not accept these statements to which I have called attention because of the faith I have in the President's acceptance of the spirit and the letter of the Constitution, for I must believe that he accepts as the best support of the logic of the law in the buttress of the Constitution itself; and in this there can be found no warrant for issuing an edict that a legislative body shall absolutely surrender its judgment and act contrary to its views, as here indicated, and pass a bill exactly as it is told to do it, through the fear of displeasure or through an apprehension of the loss of patronage or of the loss of local expenditures.

Mr. President, there could not be a more scathing arraignment of legislative interference than that I have here before me.

Mr. JONES. I wish to ask what Senator it was who made that arraignment?

Mr. BURTON. The then Senator from Colorado, Mr. Hughes, in response to questions asked by the Senator from Oklahoma, Mr. GORE.

I have here a very old book, containing the discussion in the House of Commons referred to in the words I have quoted from the debate between Senator GORE and Senator Hughes. If there were time, I should be glad to read from it. The discussion is set forth somewhat fully. Lord North, not of very pleasant memory to Americans, took part in it; and William Pitt the younger, then quite a young man; and Charles James Fox, the great commoner. All asserted 132 years ago, in a kingdom, in a country where the wonderful currents that make for the liberty and progress that have since occurred had not yet taken place, views that I think it would be very, very profitable for Senators on the other side to consider to-day.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BURTON. I shall be glad to yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the Senator from Ohio if it is not a fact that from that day to the present the ruling monarch, whether King or Queen, of Great Britain has been absolutely prohibited from interfering with legislative matters?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly. .

Mr. GALLINGER. They never have even attempted it, I believe, from that day to the present.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I make an inquiry of the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRYAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I inquire of the Senator whether I understand him to be opposed to any form of cloture?

Mr. BURTON. As I stated, when the Senator from Florida was not in, I am opposed to the consideration of it at such a time as this, when the object is to facilitate the passage of a certain measure.

Mr. FLETCHER. I understood that, but I want to inquire of the Senator whether he is opposed to any form of cloture?

Mr. BURTON. As I stated earlier in the day, I think some power of demanding the previous question, say, perhaps, by a two-thirds vote, might be advisable. I would not favor its application except after long discussion and at a time when the Senate was convinced that the people favored the measure.

In this connection, I may say, I think there are three cases in which a filibuster is not only justifiable but salutary. The first is when a vital question of constitutional right is involved; when a proposition is brought in here that a Senator can not conscientiously support.

The second case is when the measure is evidently the result of crude or inconsiderate action. I think that applies with special force to this, a measure which will not bear analysis and which when the people thoroughly understand it will meet with condemnation rather than with approval. We know what happens very well. From time to time some bill is sent in here for which a first burst of enthusiasm is aroused. It seems to be all right, but on further and more careful consideration it is found to be faulty and objectionable. Until the people can be heard from the Senate is justified in holding up the measure. I think that is true of the pending bill. Telegrams have been read from the desk from boards of trade, resolutions passed by city councils and State legislatures favoring the bill which showed on their face they did not have the least comprehension of what the measure is.

A third justification for a filibuster is when the Senate is convinced that because of some compulsion if a vote is taken it will not express the honest conviction of the Members.

I was very thoroughly convinced, Mr. President, in the last session of Congress that the bill then pending, which was opposed so vigorously, would, if it came to a vote, obtain a majority of the Members of the Senate, but that the individual convictions of an overwhelming majority of the Senators were against many items in that river and harbor bill. It seemed to me not only a privilege, but more than that, a stern duty, to oppose it as best I could. Another benefit from the long discussion which occurred at that time. The country had not been considering the river and harbor policy for years, and it was a good idea to give them a rude awakening upon the subject.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I interrupt the Senator to make a suggestion? For fear I may be misunderstood and may be challenged some time for not dissenting from the expression of Senators on the floor, I had better say, with reference to that river and harbor bill, I quite thoroughly differ with the Senator from Ohio with regard to the merits of that bill and with regard to the claimed patriotic service rendered by the distinguished Senator. I give him credit for thorough convictions from his standpoint, but I believe as fully and thoroughly as I can that the public mind of the country was poisoned largely by the allegations of "pork barrel" in connection with that bill, which prejudiced it before the country unjustifiably and erroneously. I believe that that bill had merit as it stood, and my own judgment is that so far from rendering a public service in defeating that bill great public injury was done by defeating it.

I will say, furthermore, with reference to the final amendment of the bill, no great saving has resulted from it, because the appropriations, when they were made, simply maintained the improvements without extending very meritorious improvements.

Furthermore, there were only two items in that whole bill which did not receive the approval and indorsement of the Corps of Engineers.

Mr. BURTON. I give my friend from Florida full credit for conscientiously favoring that bill. He was in one extreme strongly in favor of it and I was in the other strongly opposing it. There were between us quite a number of persons who did not believe in it at all, but who were going to vote for it. That is what I complained of.

The Senator from Florida says that all but two of the items were approved by the Corps of Engineers. That old saying impresses me very strongly, but I have seen so many absurd projects recommended by the Corps of Engineers that I am beginning to feel it is time for the Senate and for Congress to exercise a judgment of their own. When, for instance, I see an item of $18,700,000 for one of the Southern States, $9,000,000 of it to be used for water-power development and $9,000,000 for navigation, and the $9,000,000 for water power to be turned over to a private corporation having 99 years in which to repay it at 3 per cent interest, I think some of these propositions that are sent in to us should be subject to very careful revision.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to ask him whether the Corps of Engineers recommend various projects with the same freedom the Supervising Architect recommends the erection of a public building?

Mr. BURTON. I think so; though perhaps with somewhat more restraint.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think the Supervising Architect has never failed to recommend the erection of a public building for which a Congressman has introduced a bill.

Mr. BURTON. It is even so with the Corps of Engineers; both are responsive to public demand in a very great degree.

It is said the defeat of the rivers and harbors bill did not save anything. Yes; but it did, Mr. President. I could call off a number of things it saved—$5,860,000 to the Sacramento and Feather Rivers; $4,400,000 to the upper Cumberland; an indefinite number of millions, about eight, for the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal, which is less objectionable and may sometime be profitably adopted; an indefinite number of millions, ten or twenty, on the Tennessee River; $750,000 on the Oklawaha, down in Florida; a smaller appropriation for the Kissimmee. If the Senator from Florida is right and all those projects were commendable, why is it that so many of them were left out of the present bill? If they were right, why not put them in the present measure and press them to a conclusion? Why did you not put in the Kissimmee? Why did you not put in the Oklawaha? Why did you not put in others all over the country? Down there in Florida, since abandoning those projects, they have been very appropriately singing a familiar song, with a slight deviation:

> Good-by Kissimmee, farewell Tampa;
> It's a long way to Oklawaha,
> But we'll try to get there some other day.

[Laughter.]

They are left out for the present.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. I ask the Senator from Ohio if it is not true, however, that the Senate Committee on Commerce have increased to a very large extent the appropriations in the bill as it was passed by the House?

Mr. BURTON. By three or four million dollars, I believe. I have the report here somewhere.

Mr. KENYON. Then those projects, some of which were supposed to be dead, are really not dead; at least, their ghosts seem to be stalking forth again in the present bill.

Mr. BURTON. I do not believe those ghosts that were laid in the last bill will have much vitality. I may say in this connection I regard some of the items in the present river and harbor bill as highly objectionable.

As regards the matter of obstructing the action of the majority, it has always been more or less in vogue. It has been one of the privileges of the minority in popular government. We are very much in error when we think that there is anything new under the sun. The Roman Senate had its four methods of stopping the proceedings. One was what is familiarly known and stated by the antiquarians as talking against time. That, I suppose, would be called in modern language a filibuster. The second was by demanding that each paragraph of a pending proposition be taken up separately. The third was by asking the presiding officer of the senate to call the members, to be sure a quorum was present. There was a fourth that I wish could be tried in the Senate on this bill—by demanding that every Member get up and state, as it were on his heart, what he thought of it, singulariter consulanti.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the Senator consent to an interruption?

Mr. BURTON. In just a moment. That was a rule. They could call on every member of the senate. It was a most effective method of creating delay and getting at the real sentiment, if possible.

I think that is one defect in the rules of the Senate. We ought to have that rule of the Roman body here, so that we could call, for instance, upon the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. He opposed Government ownership in Alaska. Why has he changed his mind so that he is in favor of Government ownership here?

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator made any reference to me, I ask him to repeat it.

Mr. BURTON. I think if we had the custom which prevailed in the old Roman Senate, where you could call upon every senator to express his real opinion on a bill, we might call on you to ask if you regard as consistent your vote and action on the Alaskan railroad bill and your action on this bill?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Absolutely; and I can not imagine how any human being with common sense could see any inconsistency between the two.

Mr. FLETCHER. I should like to ask——

Mr. BURTON. The Senator might say more than that if the rule of the old Roman Senate prevailed. Let me just answer that. Take the Alaskan railroad bill and compare it with this proposition. No international complications were involved. It is a part of our domain. The railroad is to be built through lands belonging to the Government of the United States which are undeveloped and can not be developed without transportation. Then, again, the cost of the railroad is to be paid by the sale of those Government lands, which are made more valuable by reason of the construction of the railroad.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. It is a modification of the old Pacific railroad grants under which, instead of giving every other section to some railroad to build the road, the Government builds it and recoups itself by the sale of the land. Now, compare that with the pending ship-purchase bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. BURTON. In one moment. We are going on the sea and going into business in competition with the whole world, taking up a part of that business, entering into this absurd competition by the ships of the United States with the ships of all the nations, where every boat that you buy is liable to bring us into international complications that may mean either war or humiliation. They are as far distant from the Alaska railroad plan and as far more objectionable as the mind can conceive.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Did the Senator from Ohio understand me, when the Alaska railroad bill was up, as at any time denying the power of the United States Government to build that road?

Mr. BURTON. Oh, I do not recall. I think possibly the Senator based his justification on the post-road provision, or something of that kind, or under the decision of the Supreme Court——

Mr. WILLIAMS. On the contrary, did not the Senator understand me to admit the power?

Now, I want to ask the Senator one question. Does the Senator see no difference between spending $30,000,000 of public money to furnish about 300,000 white people with a railroad at Government expense and spending $30,000,000 of the public money to stop the exploitive freight rates now existing upon all our commerce, affecting all our people throughout the entire United States?

Mr. BURTON. In the first place——

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Government has the power in both cases.

Mr. BURTON. The endeavor to control freight rates by investing $30,000,000 in shipping is comparable to supposing that by putting a drop in a bucket you would fill it with water. I admit the Alaska proposition was a more or less unjustifiable one. I voted against it, and I probably do not differ in opinion from the Senator from Mississippi in regard to it; but the proposal for its construction was based on an express power of the Government. Some excuse could be offered, because the Government was building a railroad on its own land in order to develop it.

Now, as to this talk about settling the whole matter of ocean rates by buying a few ships, you might as well think you could regulate the freight rates between Washington and New York by buying a single automobile truck.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will say if there was no railroad between Washington and New York, and we could not get it any other way, I would favor the Government building one.

Mr. BURTON. That is not a parallel case.

Mr. FLETCHER. But I want to ask the Senator a question before he gets away from the Roman history and practice that he suggests. Would he be willing now to say at any time to-day or to-morrow or the next day, or at any time between now and the 4th of March, that he will join me in asking the Senate to stand up one by one, beginning with ASHURST and ending with WORKS, and answer the question whether you are in favor of the bill or not?

Mr. BURTON. I would like that first rate, but I would not want it to be followed by a vote.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I desire to say that I have never cast a vote in the Senate that I would not be willing to stand here and voice my reasons for the faith in me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey is not in order. He must address the Chair and obtain permission to interrupt.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. All right. I appreciate it.

Mr. FLETCHER. If the Senator will consent to a time for that——

Mr. BURTON. I would like to consent to a time for that; it would be a most interesting exposition of views, although it could hardly be substituted for our procedure. To have an expression of the real views of Senators on pending questions before a vote is taken would certainly be an enlightening practice.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator one further question?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator suggested that this plan of buying ships might lead to international complications as one reason why it differs from the Alaska proposition and one objection he has to it. May I ask the Senator, if he were President, acting under this law, would he feel that he would be obliged or feel authorized to do anything that would involve the question of the quality of our neutrality under the law?

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I will come to that later. It has been reported by the experts of the Government that there are not 10 boats to be bought, and what does this mean except to buy the boats of belligerents? How does your measure amount to anything? How are you going to make more than a flyspeck on the transportation horizon unless you buy these interned boats? When the first argument was made in favor of this bill, it was to supply ocean transportation to South America. It was then found there are plenty of transportation facilities for that trade; in fact, it was found that the difficulties in sea-borne trade are not lack of tonnage; still the bill is pressed. What does it mean? Does it not mean that somebody is interested in selling these interned or detained boats, and that pressure is being brought, which is almost overwhelming, to sell them to the Government of the United States?

I introduced this very day a resolution calling for an investigation on that subject. I want it investigated, because I can see no benefit to be secured by this bill in aid of ocean transportation. I can see that its purpose points, just as the needle to the pole, in the direction of buying ships belonging to hostile nations. I do not see where else it leads.

Mr. FLETCHER. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not know what report the Senator refers to. I know of no such report.

Mr. BURTON. The statement of Mr. Baker, the expert employed by the department.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am not acquainted with that report, but I do not think the question as to where ships can be had has been gone into, because that situation has not yet been reached. There are here some letters to the effect that there are offered some Scandinavian ships, Norwegian and Italian ships, and perhaps some South American ships. That, however, is a bridge we have not reached, and there is no use going into that, it seems to me, until we have determined whether we are to get any ships or not or whether this bill is to be passed. The question may arise about building new ones, and all that sort of thing, but I submit there is no justification for the claim that it is contemplated to buy interned ships.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, if that is true, why not admit an amendment to this bill that no interned or detained ships in the harbors of the United States or other countries shall be purchased by the Government? That has been resisted.

Mr. FLETCHER. If the Senator asks me that question, I would say that it is not the wise, proper, patriotic, or courageous course for the Senate to take or for any branch of the Government to write into the law a renunciation of our dearest rights, which were recognized and which we had stood for in all the past.

Mr. BURTON. That shows you are looking for trouble.

Mr. FLETCHER. Not at all.

Mr. BURTON. That shows that you are willing to make trouble, and it is as distinct a statement as has been made at any time. Secretary McAdoo in a discussion last week came very nearly to that point. He seemed to advocate the purchase of these ships of belligerents interned in our harbors; and I say that we owe to the country a duty to save the people from that peril. We would be failing in our duty if we did not stand here to the bitter end and oppose a proposition so fraught with danger to the people of the United States; and, I may say, to the peace of the world.

Mr. President, I speak with a certain freedom now that I am so soon to leave the Senate, always with attachment for my colleagues here whether I differ from them politically or not; always with confidence in their patriotism, though not always with confidence in their individual judgment. I am frank to say that I have reached the conclusion that frequently the judgment of an individual in a body of this kind is better than the aggregate judgment of all. Sometimes a jury of 12 men will bring in a verdict that it is almost impossible to believe that any one of them could have voted for. But the individual members rely one upon another, and the collective judgment is something for which no man is personally responsible.

I think that sometimes in the Senate, and also in the House, measures pass which would hardly commend themselves to anyone. The mass or the collective body has different conceptions and different motives from the individuals. It may be better or it may be worse, but the action of the whole is free from that immediate and keen responsibility which belongs to one individual.

If there is any one thing which I have noticed in this body and in the other—and my legislative service extends back now a quarter of a century or more—it is the greater readiness to yield to outside pressure, the outside pressure of interested parties and, in these latter days, the pressure of the Executive.

I very much admire President Wilson and his masterful spirit; I have no word to say against his patriotism. He no doubt is seeking to work out the problems of his great office in loyalty to his ideals and with a desire to serve the people; but I can not always accept his judgment. I can not accept it especially in such a case as this, where it seems to have changed so many times since August or even since December last.

The Senate will be the glory of American institutions or it will recede from its high estate just in proportion as it asserts its independence and the independence of its individual Members. If it is like a chariot hauled behind the presidential car, the people will have little respect for us, and the Senate will be unable to fulfill its functions.

The old Roman Senate, to which I have already referred, was the center of Roman institutions at the time of Roman liberty and progress. First, it was an advisory body—senex senes, the old men. Then it maintained the sacred traditions of the people. At a later time it sought the permanency and the unity of the policy of the State. It had charge of the public purse; it had virtually control of war and peace; it made treaties with foreign countries; it controlled the Provinces and selected the proconsuls; it suggested propositions for the comitia, or tribes, to pass upon in their discussion; and to a certain extent it determined the punishment for crimes. That authority grew until it reached the highest pinnacle of Roman strength and dominion, and afterwards it diminished.

In its earlier years the Republic was designated as "Senatus populusque Romanus"—the Roman Senate and people. The Senate came first. With that transcribed on his banners, in full or by initials, Scipio fought at Zama; under that same legend the troops of Pompey gathered in the East; it was that which inspired Regulus to return to the fiercest torments at Carthage; it was that which sustained the legions of Cæsar in the conquest of the barbarians of Gaul; and that same banner was raised aloft when the popular assemblies met—the Senate and the Roman people.

Why was the Roman Senate great? Because of the independence of its members and their lack of subserviency. That Senate endured for a thousand years, a marvelous contrast of glory and of shame, of courage and subserviency, of probity and of base corruption. At length it fell from its high estate, when it became subject to a dictator or a monarch. And the glory and dignity of Rome departed in that dark day when these the representatives of the people abdicated their rights to the centralized authority of a dictator. Have we forgotten this lesson? I am not exaggerating.

What is popular government? It is government by the people. Always in the growth of popular government you will see not the edict or the ukase of the king, but the assertion of the rights of some representative of the people. It was John Hampden who stood against the power of the King to levy arbitrary taxes in the House of Commons; it was Speaker Lenthall who bowed deferentially to the King when he came to the House, but refused to give way. All along in the brightest pages of English history wherever a new conception of human rights has been asserted, wherever genuine progress has been made in the cause of liberty, it has been because some man, patriotic and courageous and free, has stood up as the tribune of the people in their representative assemblies or in the gatherings of conventions to give some new idea of the rights of man, sometimes in stress and in storm, as in the days of Mirabeau and of Danton, but always courageously progressing, sometimes in excess, sometimes going too far, but always quickening human thought and awakening new conceptions of what the political and social rights of a people should be.

Just so sure as that pathway which has been marked out by Burke, Pitt, Chatham, Gladstone, and Webster, Clay, and Calhoun, and all the great leaders of this Senate and of the other House is blocked by a new theory, that the Executive must prevail, then we must say farewell to those influences that have dominated this people.

Here is a bill virtually sent from the White House; and we are asked to remain here, to turn aside from all salutary legislation, to throw the appropriation bills into the wastebasket, to ignore rural credits, to postpone the consideration of conservation under which water power can be developed—a million dollars worth of coal is burned up every day which could be saved to the people, if we had a rational system for the development of water power, and bills are pending in the Senate to that end—we are commanded, I say, to stop the wheels of legislation and pass this ship-purchase bill! In support of that bill a varying majority are standing, and they declare that they will stand to the end of the session.

Mr. President, we feel justified in resorting to every proper means to defeat this bill. We feel that it should be thoroughly explained, that by investigations we should ascertain what is behind it, that the people should understand it, and that no hasty action should be permitted.

I deplore the action of those on the other side of the Chamber who are willing to submit to Executive dictation in this matter. They are prejudicing the cause of salutary popular government by doing so. Virgil in his poetic dreams heard Jupiter from the heights of Olympus declare of the Roman people, "To them I have given dominion without end." It was to be an everlasting republic; but it crumbled to dust, leaving its institutions, its laws, its ideas as a heritage to the world, but as a government it passed away.

In this country of ours, to which so many have come and are still coming from beyond the sea, we have tried a new experiment under new ideas, whose watchwords are liberty and progress. We have become, I believe, the hope of the most advanced, the most progressive, the most intelligent people of the world. At any rate, to America the poor and the struggling look for a bright example. That bright example will be broken like a statue thrown from its pedestal unless the Members of the Senate and the Members of the House of Representatives maintain their prerogatives as an independent force in this Republic.

The people who have migrated to these shores came to escape exclusive authority. They organized the town meeting, the village council, the legislative body; and are you now going to trample these legislative institutions in the dust? Shall you say that the Members of this body shall wait with listening ears for the whisper from the White House, and when that whisper comes we will meet in caucus and force the measure through? Are you, Members of the Senate, willing to take that responsibility for your own future and for the future of this country? Are you willing that the Senate should abdicate its authority and become but a mere echo, as it were? The issue rests with you, Democrats.

A week ago Thursday I had the pleasure of participating in a joint discussion on this bill with the Secretary of the Treasury, who said that he hoped this would be a nonpartisan measure. The same evening another member of the Cabinet, the Secretary of State, out in the Hoosier State, declaimed in the loudest language against those Democrats who had left their party, as he expressed it. Mr. President, they did not leave their party. They had the independence to stand by their convictions of right in defiance of "King Caucus" and in defiance of Executive interference. When, on the preceding Monday, seven Members of the Senate on the Democratic side had voted against certain provisions of this bill, I felt that it might be a nonpartisan measure after all.

Mr. President, I repeat, this is no time to adopt a rule in the Senate providing for cloture. This is especially no time to adopt the resolution of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. BURTON. I am glad to yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to get the opinion of the Senator from Ohio as to why it is that of all the measures that have been before this Congress, even including the tariff, there should suddenly appear this shipping measure, to take its place as the one acute party measure of the entire Congress? How does the Senator explain that?

Mr. BURTON. I will say to the Senator from Washington that it is utterly inexplicable. Not the tariff, nor the Federal reserve act, nor the Trade Commission bill, nor the Clayton antitrust bill had any such pressure behind them as has this measure here. Another feature of it is that there is a very different theory regarding this bill to-day from what there was when it was introduced. The proposition seems to be to pass the bill regardless of its provisions.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. BRISTOW. May I inquire of the Senator how many million dollars are involved in the ships that are interned in New York and Boston? What is the actual value of the ships that are there waiting for purchase?

Mr. BURTON. I gave a partial estimate of that in some remarks I made a few days ago; I am not sure that I gave an estimate of the value, but I gave a list of the vessels. I would say, as an approximate figure, $125,000,000. That is not so much an estimate as a guess.

Mr. BRISTOW. With that much money involved in ships that are waiting to be purchased, does the Senator wonder that there is pressure behind a bill that offers the opportunity for purchase?

Mr. BURTON. Well, it does seem to me as though the great value of the ships interned, which are now useless and which cost from $50,000 to $100,000 a day to maintain, would be a very powerful factor in support of such a bill as this.

Mr. BRISTOW. Does the Senator not think that that is the most plausible reason that can be assigned for the persistency with which the demand is made that the ships be purchased and not constructed in our own yards?

Mr. BURTON. I have been groping around for reasons, but I am so utterly mystified as to the cause of the pressure behind this bill that I am prone to throw up my hands and say I can not tell what the reason may be.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield further to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. BRISTOW. Has the Senator not observed that the opposition to changes in the bill is directed more to that clause which provides for the purchase than to any other?

Mr. BURTON. The Senator refers to that clause which provides for the purchase of the foreign belligerent ships?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes; the foreign belligerent ships.

Mr. BURTON. Every time you bring up that proposition its advocates seem to run away.

Mr. BRISTOW. Well, has it not been distinctly stated in the public press that the force behind this bill would never consent to its amendment so as to provide against the purchase of ships from belligerents?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; I have seen that statement made. I introduced a resolution to-day providing for an investigation; and, as the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] is here, I desire to call his attention to that resolution, providing for an investigation by five Senators to learn whether any firm, individual, or corporation in the country—and that, of course, includes banking and all other firms—have made loans to ships detained in our harbors or the harbors of other countries, and also whether any options have been given on any such ships. I am sure that that investigation would produce some interesting information. I hope the Senator from Mississippi will see that that resolution is reported from the committee promptly, or, at any rate, that it is brought before the Senate at the earliest possible date. We have had many investigations in the last two or three years, and I think the one proposed by my resolution one of the most desirable of them all. Let us ascertain the real facts about this matter.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let me make a further inquiry of the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield further to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. BRISTOW. Is it a fact that ships that are not in use, that are tied up at the wharves, depreciate in value and deteriorate more rapidly than when they are in use?

Mr. BURTON. So far as the hulls are concerned they deteriorate more rapidly; so far as the machinery is concerned, probably not. Taking the ship as an entirety, it probably is a little worse off at the dock than it would be on the ocean.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let me make a further inquiry. Suppose that the ships now tied up in New York and Boston because of the war should remain there for two years, with the incidental expenses of taking care of them, the deterioration of the vessels, and the idle capital invested in them, what would be their comparative value now with what it would be if there were no war and they were permitted to be used?

Mr. BURTON. It would be very difficult to make an estimate. The most serious feature is that the investment in the boats is entirely lost. They are not only deprived of their earning capacity, but they are a source of very large expense while detained or interned in a neutral harbor. Their crews must be maintained, partly to care for the vessel and partly because if the time should come when they could resume their sailings it would be very difficult to get together a new crew. That does not include all of the men, but it does include expert machinists, engineers, and so forth. The vessel owners can not afford to let them go, and so they retain them and pay them wages. During the time the vessels are in port the deterioration would be very appreciable.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let me make another inquiry of the Senator. The value of the ship depends upon the duration of the war, does it not?

Mr. BURTON. Yes, largely. If the war should last much longer and they should be still interned—well, they are like useless hulks where they are now, and, indeed, worse than useless hulks, because they involve the expense of maintaining crews and keeping them in repair.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let me ask the Senator a further question. A ship costing, we will say, $2,000,000 has been used for a year and is now tied up, taking into consideration that it may have to remain there for one, two, or three years under expense to its owners, what would be its commercial value now, in the opinion of the Senator?

Mr. BURTON. That is naturally somewhat a matter of conjecture. I should say not more than half. If these ships are in the harbor of New York or Boston or Charleston or Galveston, and it is uncertain when they can be restored to service, the buyer would naturally take advantage of that fact. He would be a "bear" on the value of the ship. Another feature about it is that these boats are almost all under bond. They are mortgaged—that is generally true of boats, anyway—and they are liable to be foreclosed and sold for a song. They are liable also to some admiralty liens. They may be sold by order of the court. They are in a most undesirable position.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let me inquire again of the Senator whether he can imagine any kind of property the real value of which in a purchase could be so covered up as these ships, situated as they are?

Mr. BURTON. They certainly would be in the very front rank in that regard.

Mr. BRISTOW. In other words, would not this bill, if passed, open up the finest opportunity that could possibly be found for corruption in Government expenditure?

Mr. BURTON. It makes it possible to purchase boats that are now in a most perilous position for their owners, and revives their investment, which now threatens to be almost valueless.

Mr. BRISTOW. I did not ask the Senator whether in his opinion there would be corruption. My question was whether it would not offer the opportunity if anybody were disposed to exercise it?

Mr. BURTON. It certainly would. In this connection, I want to say that buying any ships would give an opportunity for corruption and scandal of this kind. If the Government had kept back this bill, things would have continued as they were after the passage of the act of last August. One hundred and three ships have been acquired under this act and transferred from foreign flags to our own; but with the introduction of this bill and the pressure from the administration for its passage those transactions have almost stopped.

Now, see what has happened. A boat that was then worth $150,000 is held at $450,000. A concrete case was cited here just a few days ago. A couple of old tubs belonging to an American line that could not command $50,000 then have been sold within a few days for $150,000. They have gone up to three times the price for which they could have been bought earlier in this Congress, and would have been bought by private enterprise if the Government had not interfered and scared them out.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let me inquire again——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio further yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. BRISTOW. Suppose some one had been of the opinion that such legislation as this was to be proposed and put through, and he had advance information to that effect. Would not the opportunity for speculation, even if he was not in the Government service, if he was outside the Government service, have been practically unlimited?

Mr. BURTON. That is, if he had secured options on the vessels?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. BURTON. Yes; certainly.

Mr. BRISTOW. Has the Senator any information as to whether such options have been obtained?

Mr. BURTON. I can not say that I have. But I have to-day introduced a resolution asking that very question. Naturally I would not have asked the question if I had known.

Mr. BRISTOW. I did not ask the Senator if he knew. I asked him if he had any reason to believe that possibly such options had been obtained.

Mr. BURTON. It is currently reported that they have been obtained.

Mr. BRISTOW. And, as I understand, the Senator has introduced this resolution to find out?

Mr. BURTON. Exactly; one resolution requesting information from the Secretary of the Treasury, and another resolution calling for an investigation. They supplement each other. I wish again to say to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] that I hope there will be no delay in acting upon that resolution. I have been seeking for some days to introduce it, but either because of continuous sessions or the fact that the morning hour was occupied with other business I have not had an opportunity to present it.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio further yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BURTON. I do.

Mr. BRISTOW. May I again inquire of the Senator whether he believes that we need a naval auxiliary?

Mr. BURTON. Oh, certain boats are needed for the Navy, but those would naturally be of a peculiar type. A naval auxiliary is not necessarily a useful boat for purposes of ordinary commerce. It should be built, perhaps, to carry coal, unloading coal at sea, transferring it to a warship, or to carry oil fuel, perhaps, to be transferred. I do not think this idea that you can buy boats and turn them into a navy is based on a correct understanding of the natural use of naval auxiliaries on the one hand and of ordinary commercial ships on the other.

Mr. BRISTOW. The question I asked the Senator was intended to be preliminary to some others. The Senator, as I understand, says that a naval auxiliary might not be the most useful as a commerce carrier.

Mr. BURTON. No.

Mr. BRISTOW. I take it also, then, that a commercial boat would not necessarily be especially useful for a naval auxiliary?

Mr. BURTON. By no means. Let me give the Senator one important distinction there. A naval auxiliary should be of a high rate of speed, 16 or 18 knots, to accompany cruisers when they are on their trips. The most economical merchant or commercial boat carries, say, 10,000 tons, or perhaps a little more, and has a speed of from 10 to 12 knots. Perhaps with quadruple expansion engines she burns, say, 25 tons of coal a day. Now, one of those naval auxiliaries with a speed of 16 knots would burn a very much larger quantity of coal, and would be adapted to different purposes. The moderately slow boat is the best carrier of freight, the one with a speed of 10 or 12 knots.

Mr. BRISTOW. Do I understand the Senator to indicate that, in his opinion, if we are to have naval auxiliaries, they should be constructed for that purpose?

Mr. BURTON. As such.

Mr. BRISTOW. As such?

Mr. BURTON. Yes. I do not deny that to a certain extent you can transfer vessels from one use to the other; but in the first place, a different type of ships is required, and in the next place, what is the use of doing one thing under the guise of doing something else? If the Navy wants more ships, why not make the appropriation courageously in the naval appropriation bill? If you are going to build a fleet for ordinary commercial purposes, then do that.

Mr. BRISTOW. Now, let me make this inquiry of the Senator: Suppose we had authorized the construction of 10 or 15 or 20 ships as a naval auxiliary fleet to carry supplies and munitions of war, and so forth, for our fleet, and an emergency such as is alleged to exist at this time should occur. Could not these ships be used commercially? While not exactly constructed for that purpose, could they not be used in the emergency if it were absolutely necessary to use them?

Mr. BURTON. In a measure. I should like to ask some one present if any of our colliers or naval auxiliaries have been used in this emergency? I understand not. That is, we are not without naval auxiliaries and colliers now, and, as I understand, not one of them has been used at this time. That tends to show that they would not be used to any very great extent.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will pardon another question, has not the Senate passed a bill authorizing the use of the naval auxiliaries for commercial purposes under certain conditions?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; but, as I recall, that bill was introduced before this war commenced.

Mr. BRISTOW. And it passed the Senate. Now if that bill, which as I understand has been lying in the House committee for a year, should be passed to-morrow, we will say, by the House, then the President would be authorized to use the naval auxiliary fleet which we now have for carrying commerce under certain conditions, would he not?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. FLETCHER. Does the Senator refer to the bill passed on August 3 last?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. BRISTOW. I refer to the Weeks bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. It was passed on the 3d of August last.

Mr. BRISTOW. I did not remember when it was passed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. BURTON. The Senator from Kansas still has the floor—I mean he has the floor for a question.

Mr. BRISTOW. If that bill should pass the House, authorizing the use of these naval auxiliaries, and if the naval appropriation bill should provide for the construction of a dozen more, would not every purpose that is sought to be accomplished by this bill be accomplished except the one thing of the purchase of these ships?

Mr. BURTON. It would be working out the problem in a different way. I think it would do more good than to pass this bill. Unless prohibitive prices are paid for ships, the Government of the United States is not going to get them if this bill passes, unless it buys those belligerent ships. Now, I am not oversanguine about what could be done by the enactment of the Weeks bill. As I recall, the Secretary of the Navy and others reported rather unfavorably on what could be done; but if you want to do something, and do it quickly, that seems the best method.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let me make a further inquiry of the Senator. Apparently the only obstacle to the passage of the Weeks bill is that it does not provide for the purchase of a lot of ships.

Mr. BURTON. It may be.

Mr. BRISTOW. And, of course, there would be no opportunity for dormant options to be revived in that event.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I do not wish to say that anyone is trying to unload property on the Government. I especially do not wish to give currency to the rumors that persons close to the Government desire to sell these ships; but in view of the widespread rumors—more than that, the very common belief—that something of that kind should be investigated, we ought to ascertain the facts; and that is particularly true when here we have a bill that is pressed to the limit, and nobody can quite explain what are the reasons therefor.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BURTON. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. May I ask the Senator from Ohio for his view of this situation? The Senator from Ohio has already said that he regards the omission from the bill of any provision forbidding the purchase of belligerent vessels as a dangerous omission.

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I agree with him. Now, the so-called Gore bill has a provision of this character:

Provided further, That in making purchases of ships during the continuance of the present European war, no purchases shall be made in a way which will disturb the conditions of neutrality.

Of course, I think the Senator from Ohio will agree with me that that provision is absolutely meaningless. It accomplishes nothing. It forbids nothing. Let us suppose, however, that the bill is passed and that provision is in it. I call the Senator's attention to the provision of this bill with reference to the shipping board, namely, that it shall consist of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Commerce, and three others. The Secretary of the Treasury is named first. He is an important officer of the Government, outranking the Secretary of Commerce, and if not made the chairman of the board he will undoubtedly exercise a dominating influence upon the board. I ask the Senator whether or not, in view of what I am going to call his attention to, he would regard the administration of that proviso as being very effective or very safe in the hands of an officer of the Government who expresses himself in these terms? I may say, first, that the Secretary makes it perfectly clear in his testimony before the House Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries that it is in contemplation that these German ships—or, rather, these interned ships—shall be purchased.

Mr. BURTON. He did state before the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, did he not, that it was contemplated that those ships should be purchased?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I am not sure that he stated it in positive terms, but nobody can read the testimony without coming to the conclusion that that is what he intended. Now, on page 26 of the hearing, this occurs:

Mr. SAUNDERS. How would this bill add to the number of available bottoms when it proposes to make its purchases from existing bottoms? It will not add to the volume of bottoms.

Secretary MCADOO. There is a large number of idle bottoms. They may be purchased.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Chiefly, are not those all German bottoms?

Secretary MCADOO. More of those are idle at the moment than any other.

This is the point to which I desire to invite the Senator's attention and ask his opinion about:

Mr. SAUNDERS. It has been suggested that there would be grave objection to our undertaking to purchase German bottoms.

Secretary MCADOO. Why?

Now, I ask the Senator from Ohio whether or not, in his judgment, it is a safe thing to intrust to the hands of an officer of the Government who, by his question, indicates very clearly that he can see no objection to purchasing these interned ships, the administration of this proviso, which looks to the preservation of conditions of neutrality?

Mr. BURTON. I do not think it would be.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Further on—and I invite the Senator's attention to this—the following occurred:

Secretary MCADOO. Why?

Manifesting clearly that he can see no objection to purchasing the German bottoms.

Mr. SAUNDERS. The newspapers make the statement that objection has come from the nations concerned in this war.

Secretary MCADOO. Of course I shall not attempt to talk of diplomatic matters.

Mr. SAUNDERS. They say that would be equal to furnishing immediate pecuniary aid—that is, to Germany?

Secretary MCADOO. That is a question altogether aside, I think, from the issue. I believe that it can not be successfully disputed by any individual or any nation that this Government or any Government—

Now note, not that individuals, but that—this Government or any Government has a right to buy merchant ships, provided it buys them in good faith and for a neutral purpose, and that is exactly what would be done in this case.

I invite the Senator's attention to the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury absolutely misunderstands and misstates the rule of international law upon that subject as now recognized by the allied countries engaged in this war.

Mr. BURTON. And by the Germans more strongly than by the allied countries.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. And by the Germans.

Mr. BURTON. I am hoping to reach that subject this afternoon and to discuss it fully.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes. Now, I wish to invite the Senator's serious attention to that situation, and to ask him to give us his views as to the wisdom of committing to this officer of the Government, in this delicate matter, the preservation of our neutrality, when he first indicates that he can see no objection to the purchase of these ships, and then says they may be purchased provided they are bought in good faith, and for a neutral purpose, which does not state the rule under the declaration of London at all?

Mr. BURTON. In the discussion with the Secretary last week—I have the original proof of it here, and I was trying to find just what he did say—I certainly inferred that he maintained our absolute right to buy those German interned ships. I do not think it would be safe or desirable to purchase them. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] stated here on the floor of the Senate, as I recall it, that it was not the intention to buy any of these belligerent ships. What happened? An immediate disclaimer of that sentiment was issued by the administration.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, will the Senator state by what authority he announces that a disclaimer came from the administration?

Mr. BURTON. The statement made by the President to the newspaper men on the following day, which was published in all the papers, in which he said that he was not responsible for that statement of Messrs. SIMMONS and WILLIAMS. He added that possibly they might have talked to some one at the State Department. Then followed another statement by him, given to the press and widely published, that he did not think such a provision as that should be included in the bill—that is, one forbidding the purchase of the ships of those countries.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. But the Senator has no authoritative statement from the President, has he, that he would approve the purchase of those vessels, or that he desired the purchase of those vessels?

Mr. BURTON. No formal message making that statement, of course.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It is simply a newspaper publication to which the Senator refers?

Mr. BURTON. One, however, based upon the weekly interviews which he grants to the representatives of the press. There is a perfect test for that, however. In one line you can draw an amendment debarring the Government or this corporation from buying any of these ships; yet whenever that is proposed there is an immediate refusal to consent to it. Just so long as that test fails of accomplishing anything, so long as the supporters of this bill in the Senate refuse to insert so plain a provision, it is exceedingly significant.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio further yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Senator from Ohio wish to accept as the American rule a prohibition against the privilege of buying interned vessels?

Mr. BURTON. I do under the present circumstances, when it is proposed that the Government shall go into the business. If it were left to private individuals, they might take their chances; but over and over again this principle has been stated.

A private individual may strain neutrality laws. He may buy contraband and ship it to one of the warring countries. He takes the chance of his vessel being caught by the other belligerents. That is no violation of the duty of this Government. If, however, the Government attempts to ship contraband, that is a hostile act. Now, just so in regard to these ships. Suppose a private individual should buy an interned or detained ship—and in that connection I want to say, Mr. President, that this word "interned" has been used many times rather incorrectly. An interned ship is a ship of a belligerent that puts into a neutral harbor, and the neutral nation orders it, say, to depart within 24 hours or intern. "Internment" means that it must be detained in that neutral port until the close of the war. If it is an armed ship it is placed in such a condition that it can be guilty of no hostile act.

Now, a private individual might buy one of these ships. There would be no strain on the neutrality laws in that event; but what happens if the Government buys it? This corporation is all a mask. You might just as well come out and say what it is. The Government can not create a corporation, subscribe to the stock, appoint its own officials to manage it, and then hide away and say that it is a private corporation that is acting. If the Government should buy the ship it would be interpreted as a hostile act. There is the vital distinction.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator if he considers the term "hide away" entirely just. Is not the fairer view to take that the Government, in organizing the corporation and taking stock in the corporation, instead of operating the ships as its own, puts itself in a position where it lays aside its attitude of sovereignty and subjects the corporation to all the responsibilities that attach to a private citizen? Is not that the effect of it, rather than a hiding away?

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, you can not do anything of that kind. You can not furnish the capital to create an agency to own ships and operate them and make it a Government enterprise and then deny the consequences which would accrue if the Government had spent that same money in buying ships and operating them by its own officers and men. What does this mean here, having the Secretary of the Treasury——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Instead of denying the consequences, is it not the acceptance of an additional consequence? If the Government were operating the vessels itself, the right of suit would be barred in many instances, because the sovereign would not be subject to be sued; but the Government having placed its money in the stock of a private corporation, and having organized the business under this corporation, and having so conducted it, is it not really an act by the Government, which divests it of many of the attributes of sovereignty and subjects the corporation to legal procedure which otherwise would not be applicable to it? Instead of hiding away, is it not opening up a broader acceptance of the responsibility?

Mr. BURTON. I do not think so. You always go to the substance of the transaction.

Mr. FALL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. FALL. I will ask the Senator if this is not the distinction, rather? It is perfectly clear to me, and I think it is to the Senator from Ohio, that in forming a corporation going into the work the Government does waive some of its sovereignty and does limit itself to some extent, so far as our own laws are concerned; but in so far as avoiding international complications or placing itself beyond the pale of international law, the consequences are exactly the same as if the corporation had not been employed.

Mr. BURTON. It must be the same. The argument that is made by the Secretary of the Treasury is that in the whole management of the corporation it is essential that the ships shall be under the control of the President of the United States. In all its international phases it must be so.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator pardon me? I did not mean to indicate that I regarded the Government as less responsible if the operation was through this corporation, the Government owning all the stock, than the Government would be if it operated the vessels directly.

Mr. BURTON. That is, you mean in the international phases?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Yes. I did not mean that at all. What I meant was that the effect of this organization would be to place that corporation in the courts of the world subject to suit as our own Government would not be subject if the Government itself were operating the vessels.

Mr. BURTON. Especially in a time of emergency like this we must adhere to the substance and not to the form. In view of the statement, which I am pleased to hear the Senator from Georgia make, that it would not change the general international relations, I can see no difference in the matter as to who shall bring suit. But as to the consequences arising from the action of a prize court it would make very little difference.

Mr. JONES and Mr. BRISTOW addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield, and to whom?

Mr. BURTON. I yield to the Senator from Washington. I think he rose first.

Mr. JONES. I wish to ask the Senator whether, in view of the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia, that by putting them in the hands of a corporation we subject these ships to the same risks they would have in private ownership, we would not have a right to infer that these ships, if they are willing to take the risk, might carry contraband?

Mr. BURTON. That is really for the Senator from Georgia to say. If they did carry contraband, it would be immediately regarded as a hostile act by the Government which was offended by that act. Bear in mind the essential difference between the direct or indirect act by the Government and the act of a citizen of the United States, a private individual, and you have the crux of the whole situation.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I agree with the Senator from Ohio fully that these vessels owned by a corporation in which the Government is a stockholder could not handle contraband of war. It would be an unfriendly act, and would be utterly inexcusable. There is no issue between us on that subject.

Mr. BURTON. I will say to the Senator from Georgia, I think that is the vital point in the whole question.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. BRISTOW. I wish to inquire if we do not now have transports belonging to the Government under the control of the War Department that could be used commercially if so desired by the administration?

Mr. BURTON. We have the Panama boats, certainly, and the Army transports. I do not see why they could not be used. I am informed that the administration which is pressing us to pass this law authorizing the purchase of ships is seeking to sell two boats.

Mr. BRISTOW. That is exactly the question I wanted to ask. Did not the Secretary of War recommend that the General Crook and the General Meade, Army transports, be sold, and was there not a provision in the Army appropriation bill as originally introduced to sell those ships?

Mr. BURTON. I so understand.

Mr. BRISTOW. And are not these commercial ships that were transposed into transports and used, and were they not bought for the use of the Army?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; they were boats purchased some years ago as commercial ships, and during the Spanish-American War made over into Army transports. They could be restored to their old condition and used to relieve this freight congestion of which we hear so much. But instead of that the administration is seeking to sell them with one voice and with another it asks us to pass a bill appropriating thirty or forty million dollars to buy some other vessels.

Every fact that you ascertain shows the absurdity of this entire proposition. I am unable to treat with proper toleration most of the arguments we have heard in favor of it. None of them bear analysis. I am perfectly willing to say that I approach them from a nonpartisan standpoint. I do not care about political affiliations in this connection, but I view it as a business proposition. I have never known any piece of legislation based upon such an absurdity as is this measure.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BURTON. I yield.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let me inquire further, have we not also transports that are now lying idle and not being used at all?

Mr. BURTON. I think we have.

Mr. BRISTOW. Four or five, or probably half a dozen.

Mr. BURTON. Army transports?

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. BURTON. I am informed by a Representative from California, Mr. KAHN, who sits near me, that such is the case, that there are not only these two but that there are four or five others.

Mr. BRISTOW. Then, if I understand the Senator correctly, we have Army transports that were originally built as commercial ships that were acquired by the Government, and the Government is now seeking to sell two of them, asking authority from Congress to sell them, and it has a number it is not using, and these ships which the Government owns could be used for the very purposes sought to be accomplished in this bill.

Mr. BURTON. Certainly; and probably to better advantage than ships that the Government could obtain, unless it bought the interned German vessels.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let me inquire, further, if the Government should sell the transports which it now has, judging from the experience of the past, would it not sell them for a remarkably low figure?

Mr. BURTON. Yes. The fact is the Government can not sell an article of that kind and transfer it back to the trade without a very serious sacrifice. It will have to be put on the bargain counter, so to speak.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let me inquire, in the sale of the commercial ships which we bought during the Spanish-American War, did we not sell them at from 10 to 25 per cent of their original cost?

Mr. BURTON. I do not know the exact figures, but they were sold at a great sacrifice. In some remarks made here in the Senate I think possibly I did not treat with sufficient discrimination the transaction between the Government and the Atlantic Transport Co., then under the management of Mr. P. N. Baker. The general fact was stated on the floor here a couple of weeks ago that the Government obtained a lot of hulks that might well be stranded, and it created a great deal of criticism, but certain boats were bought of the Atlantic Transport Line, which, then as now, is maintaining a line between London and New York, which were of a high grade, and it is maintained that no extravagant price was paid for them. I say that in justice to all the parties, but the general statements that I made the other day and the statements made by the Senator from Iowa and others are correct, that scandal did attach to those purchases at that time.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let me inquire of the Senator again——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield further to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. BRISTOW. Did we not sell the ships at such a ridiculously low price that Congress felt compelled to pass a law forbidding the sale unless the consent of Congress was obtained?

Mr. BURTON. It could not be done without authority of Congress. There is some such provision in this bill. But that might lead to complications worse than the disease which it is sought to cure; that is, the boats might be held indefinitely.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Under whose administration was the sale had?

Mr. BURTON. I think none were sold under President McKinley's administration, but they were all sold, I think, under President Roosevelt's. I do not think we can blame them so much for selling them; they were a dead-weight. The maintenance of a vessel is a constant source of expense, and it deteriorates in value very rapidly.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield further to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. BRISTOW. Referring to the administration under which they were sold, I understand they were sold under the administration of Mr. Roosevelt.

Mr. BURTON. I think so. Possibly some were sold under the administration of Mr. McKinley before his death in September, 1901, but I think not.

Mr. BRISTOW. However, the fact remains that the present administration is seeking to sell others of these boats.

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. BRISTOW. That is, as I understand the Senator, the present administration wants to sell ships which it now has, which are commercial ships?

Mr. BURTON. I am so informed.

Mr. BRISTOW. And at the same time it seeks to go out and buy others.

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. BRISTOW. Would it not be interesting if we could know the relative prices that we shall pay and receive?

Mr. BURTON. We would know before we got through with it. We might not know now.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator inform us upon what authority he claims that the administration desires to sell commercial vessels that now belong to the Government? I have heard nothing of the kind. On the contrary, I thought the desire was to utilize the commercial vessels which the Government now has for commercial purposes.

Mr. BURTON. I understand that the Army transports, the Crook, the Meade, the Logan, and others, have been offered in the market, and the Government has been seeking to sell them. That is my information on the subject. If I am wrong about it I will be glad to correct it, but I think that statement has been made without contradiction. If it is true it is a very important fact.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The information I have had has been that if the Weeks bill, which the Senate passed, were passed by the other House, it is the purpose to utilize for commercial purposes all the vessels connected with the Navy which could be so used.

Mr. BURTON. The boats I mention—the Crook, the Meade, and so forth—are Army transports.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then they are vessels that can not be used at all for commerce.

Mr. BURTON. Oh, yes; they were originally built over from commercial ships. I presume some of those very boats were bought from the Atlantic Transport Co.

Mr. BRISTOW. If I may do so—if it will not jeopardize the right of the Senator——

Mr. BURTON. I do not wish to lose the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No. The Senator from Ohio yields to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BRISTOW. If I may, without jeopardizing the right of the Senator from Ohio to the floor, I will state for the benefit of the Senator from Georgia that the Secretary of War recommended the sale of the General Crook and the General Meade, Army transports, and the provision was contained in the Army appropriation bill as it was introduced in the House. As I remember, it was cut out in the House.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Those were Army transports which could not be used for commercial purposes.

Mr. BRISTOW. They had been commercial vessels and were bought and transposed into transports, and of course they could be transposed back into commercial vessels just as well. They were bought just as it is proposed these ships shall be bought, and they could be changed, if need be, into commercial vessels.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Then, of course, they would have to be changed in connection with the others in order to be utilized for commercial purposes.

Mr. BRISTOW. It seems to me that they ought to be utilized under the Weeks bill, if we could get that bill passed, and there would not be any trouble at all.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Weeks bill in its present terms cover those vessels as well as those connected with the Navy?

Mr. BRISTOW. It covers the Navy; I am not certain about the transports. It ought to cover the transports, I am free to say.

Mr. BURTON. I understand there was a provision in the Army appropriation bill as introduced in the House providing for the sale of two of those boats, the Crook and the Meade. Some person of an inquiring mind asked why is it that when an effort is made to pass a ship-purchase bill an effort is also made to sell these ships, and the provision was cut out. But the question arises why, when these boats are on hand, do you not remodel them? You would not have any trouble about it. If the administration sent a recommendation here for the necessary appropriations for putting those ships into a condition to carry trade, there would be no trouble in passing the bill in a very few days. It would not be opposed here. An amazing situation appears, an attempt to force a bill through having a provision for the purchase of ships and, on the other hand, the recommendation of the Secretary of War that the ships shall be sold. I think that calls for explanation.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly, I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator from Georgia asked a question of the Senator from Ohio that I do not think was fully answered, and I wish to press that question a little further, because it is most important.

The Senator from Georgia asked the Senator from Ohio if he thought the Government ought to adopt a policy that our citizens or the Government itself could not buy an interned vessel. The Senator from Ohio I do not think fully answered that question; therefore I want to put this question to the Senator: Has the Government ever adopted a policy under which this country or any other neutral country could buy an interned vessel?

Mr. BURTON. Not to my knowledge. I think you will search in vain for any judicial decision in support of it.

Mr. McCUMBER. On the contrary, was it not held by this Government in the case of the Georgia that a British subject could not buy such a vessel, dismantle it, and put it again into trade? Did we not hold directly that it could not do it?

Mr. BURTON. So far as the case is parallel, it goes to sustain the view which is held on the Continent of Europe that a neutral does not have the right after the outbreak of hostilities to buy a belligerent ship.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am making a vast difference between buying a belligerent vessel and buying an interned vessel. The question I put to the Senator is not whether we can buy a belligerent vessel, because I understand we can always do that, but whether we have ever adopted a policy whereby we conceded to any neutral when we were at war that they could buy a vessel which we had compelled to be interned or imprisoned in their ports.

Mr. BURTON. No; we certainly have not.

Mr. McCUMBER. Now, let me ask the Senator another question.

Mr. BURTON. Is an interned boat different from a boat that is merely detained in a harbor?

Mr. McCUMBER. I am going to meet that by another question, and it is this: Are not those important vessels which have been driven into our ports—what I call imprisoned, not interned, but they are in our ports because they dare not go out—so constructed that they could be turned into army transports?

Mr. BURTON. Many of them could be.

Mr. McCUMBER. Or converted into cruisers?

Mr. BURTON. Many of them were built under the provision that they should be turned over to the army or navy whenever they were needed.

Mr. McCUMBER. Now, that brings me right to the next question. If this Government admits the right of one of our citizens to buy those vessels in our ports, would not that citizen have a right to take one of those vessels and sail it to Hamburg with noncontraband goods?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then I want to put the next question. Would not the citizen, after he got it into Hamburg, have an equal right to sell it to the German Government and the German Government immediately transform it into a cruiser, provided it was sold in good faith?

Mr. BURTON. For an Army transport or naval auxiliary or any warlike purpose they pleased.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does the Senator believe that would be an unneutral act?

Mr. BURTON. It certainly would not.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then, if the Senator says it would not be an unneutral act, is not the Senator forced to the conclusion that we would not have the right in the first instance to do that which, when followed up, would become unneutral?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly. I do not believe the right of purchase exists in the first instance.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The suggestion I desire to make to the Senator from Ohio is this: I wish to ask him if the view presented by the Senator from North Dakota is not a very different view from simply the suggestion that interned vessels could not be bought? Is not the case he makes one in which he insists that the purchase could not be made because the interned vessels were prepared for use as military or naval vessels, having been so constructed that they could be readily supplied with cannon? The case he makes is not one simply of objecting to the purchase of interned vessels, but of objecting to interned vessels that have been prepared for military use by the Government under the requirements of the Government whose citizens now own them. Does not that fall entirely outside of the simple class of an interned vessel?

Mr. BURTON. I do not think so altogether. Mr. President, I find I will not have an opportunity this afternoon to go into the subject of the transfer of belligerent ships to neutral flags. My intention at first was to dwell upon that at greater length than some other phases I have discussed, and at a future time I shall seek to discuss it more fully. I may briefly state some of the more important facts.

Article 56 of the declaration of London provides that the transfer of a belligerent ship to a neutral flag after the outbreak of hostilities is void unless it can be shown that such transfer was not made to avoid the consequences of war. An order of the Privy Council has made the declaration of London, with certain modifications, the policy of Great Britain as to the rights of belligerents and neutrals.

I may also state that Germany has in substance proclaimed the same rule. In all this discussion I do not mean to make any distinction between buying an English ship and buying a German ship. They are both on the same footing.

As preliminary to a later discussion of this subject I want to read the French and German rules on this point. These are the German regulations framed in pursuance of the London conference issued first on the 30th of September, 1909, approved by the Emperor and promulgated August 3, 1914:

With the exceptions specified under 6, enemy ships are subject to capture. Regarding enemy vessels of the State, see 2.

Ships are adjudged enemy or neutral ships by the flag they are entitled to carry.

The flag which a ship is entitled to carry is determined in accordance with the flag law of almost all maritime States from an official document that any merchant ship must have on board.

If the nationality of a ship can not be readily established, and especially if the document required in accordance with the flag law of the respective State is not in evidence, then the ship shall be considered as an enemy ship.

Ships that after the outbreak of the hostilities have been transferred from the enemy to the neutral flag are also to be considered as enemy ships.

(a) If the commander is not convinced that the transfer would have followed, even if war had not broken out, as, for instance, by succession or by virtue of a construction contract.

Now, that is the substance of the whole thing. The French rules do make an exception in case of inheritance or succession. The German rule goes a little further and makes an exception in the case of a belligerent ship consigned to a neutral when a construction contract had been entered into before the outbreak of hostilities.

(b) If the transfer is effected while the ship is bound on a voyage or is at anchor within a blockaded harbor.

It is hardly necessary for me to read this. The substance of it is contained in the first one.

I also read the order promulgated August 3, 1914:

LAW GAZETTE OF THE EMPIRE.

YEAR 1914.

(No. 50.)

(No. 4428.) Prize ordinance of September 30, 1909.

I approve the accompanying prize ordinance and direct that in the enforcement of the prize law my fleet commanders shall during the war proceed in accordance with the provisions of the prize ordinance. In so far as it may be necessary to make exception thereto in special cases, you shall make proposition to that end to me. I empower you to give such interpretation to this ordinance and to make such changes thereto as may be necessary, provided they are not of fundamental importance.

Rominten, September 30, 1909.

(Signed) WILHELM.

In the absence of the Imperial Chancellor,

(Countersigned) v. TIRPITZ.

Promulgated at Berlin, August 3, 1914.

There has been a good deal of discussion concerning the declaration of London and the English attitude regarding it. I insert this because it is important in this connection.

An order has been later issued by the German Government which in a manner modifies this. It is in the following language:

The Imperial German Government's naval policy is directed by the declaration of London, with only such alterations as necessitated by England's refusal to recognize the said declaration.

Passports have been issued to former British ships transferred to the American flag under the following conditions:

1. The transfer to the American flag is recognized only in case the ships are engaged in direct trade with Germany, and only as long as that is the case.

It is understood that these ships carry cargo from American to German ports and vice versa. The goods exported from Germany to the United States of America must be destined for exclusive consumption in the United States.

2. The request for a passport is to be submitted to the competent German consul, accompanied by the bill of sale, which is to be legalized by the United States Department of State. The consul will then take the necessary steps to obtain the passport from this embassy.

3. The passports are valid for one round trip only.

4. No alien enemies (British, French, Russians, Japanese, Belgians, Servians, Montenegrins) may be included in the ship's crew.

It will be noticed that that latter order modifies the former one of the approval of the London declaration, but only in one essential particular, namely, that they will allow these ships to be sold if they are engaged exclusively in trade between the United States and Germany. Of course, any combatant having difficulty in securing supplies would allow an exception of that kind; so that it does not in reality amount to any exception.

I ask also to have printed the French instructions on this subject. Perhaps the French original had better be printed, as well as the translation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission to do so is granted.

The instructions referred to are as follows:

[Extract from "Instructions on the Application of International Law in Case of War. Addressed by the minister of marine to the general, superior, and other officers commanding the naval forces and vessels of the [French] Republic." Dated December 19, 1912.]

112. Le transfert sous pavillon neutre d'un navire ennemi, effectué après l'ouverture des hostilités, est nul, à moins qu'il ne soit établi que ce transfert n'a pas été effectué en vue d'éluder les conséquences qu'entraîne le caractère de navire ennemi, par exemple, par suite d'héritage.

113. Toutefois, il y a présomption absolue de nullité:

1. Si le transfert a été effectué pendant que le navire est en voyage ou dans un port bloqué;

2. S'il y a faculté de réméré ou de retour;
3. Si les conditions auxquelles est soumis le droit de pavillon, d'après la législation du pavillon arboré, n'ont pas été observées.
114. Ces règles ne sont, bien entendu, pas applicables lorsque la vente du navire ennemi à un sujet neutre a été effectuée par les autorités Françaises, à la suite d'une prise.

TRANSLATION.

112. The transfer of an enemy vessel to a neutral flag, effected after the outbreak of hostilities, is void unless it is proved that such transfer was not made in order to evade the consequences to which an enemy vessel, as such, is exposed; for example, by inheritance.
113. There, however, is an absolute presumption that a transfer is void:
1. If the transfer has been made during a voyage or in a blockaded port;
2. If a right to repurchase or recover the vessel is reserved to the vendor;
3. If the requirements of the municipal law governing the right to fly the flag under which the vessel is sailing have not been fulfilled.
114. It is understood that these rules are not applicable when the sale of an enemy vessel to a neutral subject his been made by French authorities after a capture.

Mr. BURTON. I will read briefly from the instructions:

112. The transfer of an enemy vessel to a neutral flag effected after the outbreak of hostilities is void, unless it is proved that such transfer was not made in order to evade the consequences to which an enemy vessel as such is exposed; for example, by inheritance.

I have already called attention to the fact that there is another exception.

I understand the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] would like to address the Senate for an hour or so, and after that Senators wish the Senate to adjourn. I shall therefore suspend my remarks in a moment.

I wish to call attention to the resolution submitted by the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. It seems to me the adoption of such a rule as that would plainly require a two-thirds vote. The Senate, if I understand it correctly, has settled that very recently. The general rule in a parliamentary body is that any suspension of the rules or variation from the ordinary procedure requires a two-thirds vote. Beginning on the 11th of January, 1915, this occurred:

Mr. SHEPPARD gave notice of his intention to move an amendment to the standing rules of the Senate, namely, to suspend paragraph 3 of Rule XVI, for the purpose of moving a certain amendment to the District of Columbia appropriation bill—the so-called prohibition amendment. On January 12 he offered the amendment to the rules and it was referred to the Committee on Rules. On January 13 the Committee on Rules reported favorably; and on motion the Senate proceeded to consider the report. The point of order was raised that it required, under Rule XL, a two-thirds vote upon the proposition to suspend the rules or any portion thereof. The Chair submitted the question to the Senate, and the Senate decided by a vote of 41 yeas to 34 nays that the point was well taken. This whole proceeding is recorded in the RECORD, on page 1563.

If that is not exactly on all fours with this proposition, I am unable to understand the rule. That was an appropriation bill, and general legislation can not go on an appropriation bill; but the Senator from Texas moved to suspend the rules so as to allow him to offer substantive or affirmative legislation. The matter was discussed at considerable length, and it was decided that the rule could not be suspended except by a two-thirds vote.

Here is a rule of the Senate that has existed for 117 years, namely, that there is no cloture of debate. That is perhaps the most distinctive rule of the Senate. The proposition is not one of amending the standing rules permanently, which may, in the way provided, undoubtedly be done by majority vote, but is in effect a motion to suspend temporarily a rule in the case of a particular bill. It seems to me, Mr. President, there is no answering the argument that it requires a two-thirds vote.

In view of the understanding that the Senator from Oklahoma is to follow me and that there is to be an adjournment at the close of his remarks, Mr. President, I now yield the floor.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, during the last two years, since March, 1913, the Senate of the United States has had one important measure after another brought before it for consideration by the Democratic administration. There was a prolonged and obvious filibuster in the Senate dealing with the tariff bill. In order probably to prevent any action upon the Federal reserve bill, there was a resolute filibuster even on the question of allowing a water supply for the city of San Francisco; there was a filibuster, using that bill as a general buffer against proposed progressive legislation, which made it necessary in handling that bill, as well as in handling the tariff bill and the Federal reserve act, for the Senate to meet in the morning and to run until 11 o'clock at night. We had no vacation during the summer of 1913 or during the summer of 1914, because of the vicious filibustering of the Republican Senators. If this method of filibustering shall remain as a practice of the Senate of the United States, obviously the Congress of the United States must remain in continuous session from one year's end to another in order to accomplish even a slight part of what is desired by the people of the United States, and in order in some small degree to enact the important measures which are presented to the Senate for consideration on favorable reports from the committees of the Senate.

I call attention to the large calendar which we have, a calendar of some thirty-odd pages, representing hundreds of measures of importance, which we never arrive at; and even aside from the calendar there are matters of the greatest possible importance, which are not being considered by the body and not being presented by the committees, because it is well known that to make reports upon them would be perfectly useless in view of this now apparently well-established custom of a continuous filibuster against everything desired by the majority party.

This practice of filibustering has not been confined to one side of the Chamber only. I agree with the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] that the filibuster quickly passes from one side of the Chamber to the other as an exigency may arise, according to the desire of those who may be on either side of the aisle. I submit, however, a filibuster favoring the people is not to be compared to a filibuster against the people, although an unjustifiable parliamentary procedure, except under very extraordinary conditions.

It has been offered as a criticism of my view with regard to a cloture rule for the Senate, that on one occasion—March 4, 1911—when the question arose with regard to the admission of New Mexico to statehood with a corporation-written constitution and an unamendable constitution, and the prevention of Arizona at the same time being admitted to statehood, I did not hesitate to use the practice of the Senate to filibuster in order to compel a vote of the Senate jointly upon the admission of Arizona and New Mexico. My use of this bad practice to serve the people does not in any wise change my opinion about the badness of the practice of permitting a filibuster. I acted within the practice, but I think the practice is indefensible, and I illustrated its vicious character by coercing the Senate and compelling it to yield to my individual will.

No one man, no matter how sincere he may be or how patriotic his purpose, should be permitted to take the floor of the Senate and keep the floor against the will of every man in the Senate except himself, and coerce and intimidate the Senate. To do so is to destroy the most important principle of self-government—the right of majority rule.

I wish to submit a brief sketch of what has been the rule with regard to "the previous question." It is an old rule, established for the purpose of preventing an arbitrary and willful individual or minority coercing the majority in a parliamentary body. I call the attention of the Senate to a work printed in 1690, Lex Parliamentaria, giving the practice in the British Parliament. On page 292 of that work this language occurs:

If upon a debate it be much controverted and much be said against the question, any member may move that the question may be first made, whether that question shall be put or whether it shall be now put, which usually is admitted at the instance of any member, especially if it be seconded and insisted upon; and if that question being put, it pass in the affirmative, then the main question is to be put immediately, and no man may speak anything further to it, either to add or alter.

Mr. President, coming down to the days of the Continental Congress, I read from page 534 of volume 11, 1778, of the Journals of the Continental Congress, giving the rules of that body and showing the purpose of the Continental Congress at that time to prevent any individual or minority unnecessarily consuming the time of that body.

6. No Member shall speak more than twice in any one debate on the same day, without leave of the House.

* * * * * * *

10. When a question is before the House no motion shall be received unless for an amendment, for the previous question, to postpone the consideration of the main question or to commit it.

Sections 13 and 14 read:

13. The previous question—that is, that the main question shall be not now put—being moved, the question from the Chair shall be that those who are for the previous question say aye and those against it, no; and if there be a majority of ayes, then the main question shall not be then put, but otherwise it shall.
14. Each Member present shall declare openly and without debate his assent or dissent to a question by aye and no, when required by motion of any one Member, whose name shall be entered as having made such motion previous to the President's putting the question; the name and vote in such cases shall be entered upon the Journal, and the majority of votes of each State shall be the vote of that State.

That was the rule of the Continental Congress. The rule of the House of Representatives is equally well known to clearly and openly recognize the previous question, count a quorum, and by a rule fix a time for voting on any question.

When it came to drafting the Constitution of the United States Mr. Pinckney proposed in his original draft a provision that the yeas and nays of the Members of each House on any question shall, at the desire of any certain number of Members, be entered on the Journal.

The committee on detail, page 166 of volume 2 of the records of the Federal Convention, by Farrand, reported as follows:

The House of Representatives and the Senate, when it shall be acting in a legislative capacity (each House) shall keep a Journal of its proceedings, and shall from time to time publish them, * * * and the yeas and nays of the Members of each House on any question shall, at the desire of any Member, be entered on the Journal.

That was retained throughout as a part of the Constitution and was discussed on Friday the 10th day of August, page 255, as follows:

Mr. Govr. Morris urged that if the yeas and nays were proper at all any individual ought to be authorized to call for them: and moved an amendment to that effect, saying that the small States would otherwise be under a disadvantage, and find it difficult to get a concurrence of one-fifth.

That was voted down unanimously, and the following States—New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, and Georgia—voted to agree to the rule that one-fifth of the Members might call for the record of the yeas and nays as a constitutional right.

I call the attention of the Senate to the proper interpretation of that language. We have ordinarily held to the practice that the yeas and nays should be called after the vote had been ordered, but the right to have the yeas and nays immediately called under the Constitution of the United States is a constitutional right. As a Senator from Oklahoma, I have a right, being present, if I am supported by one-fifth of the Members of this body, to have my vote and the vote of every other Member of this body recorded on any pending question without having my right denied by an organized filibuster. You can not record a vote on the Journal of the Senate unless you take the vote; and, therefore, the constitutional right to have my vote recorded upon the Journal at the request of one-fifth of the Members PRESENT carries a PRESENT right and not a future expectation or vague hope at some unrecorded future time that it may be recorded, when a minority or an individual may permit it. I have, therefore, a constitutional right, when supported by one-fifth of the Members of this body, to demand the immediate taking of the yeas and nays on any question pending and the record of that vote in the Journal of the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Is it not a truth applicable to everything that wherever a right is granted at all it is a right in præsenti and not in futuro, unless the grant is modified by an express statement that it is in futuro?

Mr. OWEN. Absolutely. Now, Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate to what has been done in regard to this question of cloture or limitation of debate by the Senate itself.

The Senate rules, as established at the beginning of this Government, adopted in 1789, are found upon page 20 of the Annals of the First Congress, from 1789 to 1791, volume 1. That volume contains the rules of the Senate as of that date, from No. 1 to 19, and those rules expressly provide against the abuse of the time of the Senate in a number of particulars. First, in paragraph 2, it is provided that—

2. No Member shall speak to another or otherwise interrupt the business of the Senate, or read any printed paper, while the Journals or public papers are reading, or when any Member is speaking in any debate.

3. Every Member when he speaks shall address the Chair, standing in his place, and when he has finished shall sit down.

It obviously contemplated his finishing within some reasonable time and taking his seat.

4. No Member shall speak more than twice in any one debate on the same day without leave of the Senate.

Showing the intention of the Senate that one man should not be allowed to monopolize the time of the Senate.

Paragraph 8 reads:

8. While a question is before the Senate no motion shall be received unless for an amendment, for the previous question, or for postponing the main question, or to commit it, or to adjourn.

And paragraph 9 provides:

9 The previous question being moved and seconded, the question from the Chair shall be, "Shall the main question be now put?" And if the nays prevail the main question shall not then be put.

On a divided vote the main question was to be put is a necessary consequence that flows from that language. It required a majority vote in the negative to prevent the closure of debate under the original rules of the Senate.

Paragraph 11 reads:

11. When the yeas and nays shall be called for by one-fifth of the Members present, each Member called upon shall, unless for special reasons he be excused by the Senate, declare openly and without debate his assent or dissent to the question.

Mr. President, that was the rule of the Senate up until 1806. At that time the rules were modified so as to OMIT the reference to the previous question, not by putting in any rule denying the right of the previous question, but merely omitting the previous question, on the broad theory that courtesy of free speech in the Senate would preclude any Member from the abuse of the courtesy of free speech extended to him by his colleagues, and would preclude a Senator from consuming the time of the Senate unduly, unfairly, or impudently, in disregard of the courtesy extended to him by his colleagues. The failure to move the previous question now is merely a matter of courtesy in this body, and carries with it, so long as it lasts, the reciprocal courtesy on behalf of those to whom this courtesy is extended that they shall not impose upon their colleagues who have extended the courtesy to them of freedom of debate or deny their courteous and long-suffering colleagues the right to a vote. Freedom of debate may not under such an interpretation be carried to the point of a garrulous abuse of the floor of the Senate by the reading of old records and endless speechmaking made against time, which has emptied the Senate Chamber and destroyed genuine debate in this body. At the time the previous question was dropped from the written rules of the Senate as a right under such written rules there had been no need for the "previous question." The previous question had only been moved four times and only used three times from 1789 to 1806—that is, during 17 years.

There is no real debate in the Senate. Occasionally a Senator makes a speech that is worth listening to—occasionally, and only occasionally. The fact is that even speeches of the greatest value which are delivered on this floor have little or no audience now because of this gross abuse of the patience of the Senate, which has been brought to a point where men are no longer willing to be abused by loud-mouthed vociferation of robust-lunged partisans confessedly speaking against time in a filibuster, and are unwilling to keep their seats on this floor to listen to an endless tirade intended not to instruct the Senate, intended not to advise the Senate, intended not for legitimate debate, not for an honest exercise of freedom of speech, but for the sinister, ulterior, half-concealed purpose of killing time in the Senate and thereby preventing the Senate from acting, thus establishing a minority veto under the pretense, the bald pretense, the impudent and false pretense, of freedom of debate.

This courtesy in the Senate was not greatly abused prior to the war, nor until the fierce recent conflict began between the plutocracy and monopoly and the common people. Its abuse during the last century led, however, to various proposals by various distinguished Members of this body of cloture in various forms.

The first one that I care to call attention to is that of Mr. Clay, in 1841, in connection with which Mr. Henry Clay said, among other things—this was on the 12th of July, 1841—that—

He was ready at any moment to bring forward and support a measure which should give to the majority the control of the business of the Senate of the United States. Let them denounce it as much as they pleased, its advocates, unmoved by any of their denunciations and threats, standing firm in support of the interests which he believed the country demands, for one he was ready for the adoption of a rule which would place the business of the Senate under the control of a majority of the Senate.

In the first session in the Thirty-first Congress, July 27, 1850, Mr. Douglas, then a Senator of the United States, submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the following be, and the same is, adopted as a standing rule of the Senate:

"That the previous question shall be admitted when demanded by a majority of the Members of the Senate present, and its effect shall be to put an end to all debate and bring the Senate to a direct vote, first, upon a motion to commit, if such motion shall have been made"—

And so forth.

Mr. Hale, on April 4, 1862, brought in a resolution of like purport; Mr. Wade, on June 21, 1864, proposed a like resolution; Mr. Pomeroy, on February 13, 1869; Mr. Hamlin, on March 10, 1870; and various other Senators. I ask, without reading these various proposals, to place them in the RECORD for the information of the Senate of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RANSDELL in the chair). Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

LIMITATION OF DEBATE.

[1st sess. 31st Cong., J. of S., 482, July 27, 1850.]

Mr. Douglas submitted the following motion for consideration:

"Resolved, That the following be, and the same is, adopted as a standing rule of the Senate:

"'That the previous question shall be admitted when demanded by a majority of the Members of the Senate present, and its effect shall be to put an end to all debate, and bring the Senate to a direct vote, first, upon a motion to commit, if such motion shall have been made; and if this motion does not prevail, then, second, upon amendments reported by a committee, if any; then, third, upon pending amendments; and, finally, where such questions shall, or when none shall have been offered, or when none may be pending, then it shall be upon the main question or questions leading directly to a final decision of the subject matter before the Senate. On a motion for the previous question, and prior to the seconding of the same, a call of the Senate shall be in order; but after a majority shall have seconded such motion no call shall be in order prior to a decision of the main question. On a previous question there shall be no debate. All incidental questions arising after a motion shall have been made for the previous question and, pending such motion, shall be decided, whether on appeal or otherwise, without debate.'"

(Aug. 28. The resolution was laid on the table (ib., 588).)

[2d sess. 37th Cong., J. of S., 370, Apr. 4, 1862.]

Mr. Hale submitted the following resolution for consideration:

"Resolved, That the following be added to the rules of the Senate:

"'The Senate may, at any time during the present rebellion, by a vote of a majority of the Members present, fix a time when debate on any matter pending before the Senate shall cease and terminate; and the Senate shall, when the time fixed for terminating debate arrives, proceed to vote, without debate, on the measure and all amendments pending and that may be offered.'"

[1st sess. 38th Cong., J. of S., 601, June 21, 1864.]

Mr. Wade submitted the following resolution for consideration:

"Resolved, That during the remainder of the present session of Congress no Senator shall speak more than once on any one question before the Senate; nor shall such speech exceed 10 minutes, without leave of the Senate expressly given; and when such leave is asked it shall be decided by the Senate without debate; and it shall be the duty of the President to see that this rule is strictly enforced."

[3d sess. 40th Cong., J. of S., 256, Feb. 13, 1869.]

Mr. Pomeroy submitted the following resolution, which was ordered to be printed:

"Resolved, That the following be added to the standing rules of the Senate:

"'RULE —. While the motion for the previous question shall not be entertained in the Senate, yet the Senators, by a vote of three-fifths of the Members, may determine the time when debate shall close upon any pending proposition, and then the main question shall be taken by a vote of the Senate in manner provided for under existing rules.'"

[2d sess. 41st Cong., J. of S., 347, Mar. 10, 1870.]

Mr. Hamlin submitted the following resolution for consideration:

"Resolved, That whenever any question shall have been under consideration for two days it shall be competent, without debate, for the Senate, by a two-thirds majority, to fix a time, not less than one day thereafter, when the main question shall be taken; but each Senator who shall offer an amendment shall be allowed five minutes to speak upon the same, and one Senator a like time in reply."

[Ib., 412, Mar. 25, 1870.]

Mr. Wilson submitted the following motion for consideration:

"Ordered, That the Select Committee on Rules be instructed to consider the expediency of adopting a rule for the remainder of the session providing that whenever any bill has been considered for two days the question on ordering it to a third reading may be ordered by a two-thirds vote of the Senators present and voting."

[Ib., 465, Apr. 7, 1870.]

The Senate next proceeded to consider (the above); and

On motion of Mr. Edmunds,

Ordered, That the said resolution be passed over.

[Ib., 492, Apr. 14, 1879.]

The Senate next resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. Wilson on the 25th of March last, instructing the Select Committee on the Revision of the Rules to consider the expediency of adopting a rule for the remainder of the session fixing a time when the question on ordering a bill to a third reading shall be put; and

The resolution was agreed to.

[2d sess. 41st Cong., J. of S., 778, June 9, 1870.]

Mr. Pomeroy submitted the following resolution for consideration, which was ordered to be printed:

"Resolved, That the thirteenth rule of the Senate be amended by adding thereto the following:

"'And any pending amendment to an appropriation bill may be laid on the table without affecting the bill.

"'It shall be in order at any time when an appropriation bill is under consideration, by a two-thirds vote, to order the termination of debate at a time fixed in respect to any item or amendment thereof then under consideration, which order shall be acted upon without debate."

[2d sess. 42d Cong., J. of S., Apr. 1, 1872.]

Mr. Pomeroy submitted the following resolution for consideration:

"Resolved, That upon any amendment to general appropriation bills remarks upon the same by any one Senator shall be limited to five minutes."

[2d sess. 42d Cong., J. of S., 614, Apr. 26.]

Mr. Scott submitted the following resolution, which was ordered to be printed:

"Resolved, That during the present session it shall be in order, pending an appropriation bill, to move to confine debate on the pending bill and amendments thereto to five minutes by any Senator on the pending motion, and the motion to limit debate shall be decided without debate."

[Ib., 630, Apr. 29, 1872.]

On motion by Mr. Scott,

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by him on the 26th instant, to confine debate on appropriation bills and amendments thereto for the remainder of the session; and the resolution having been modified by Mr. Scott to read as follows:

"Resolved, That during the present session it shall be in order, pending an appropriation bill, to move to confine debate on amendments thereto to five minutes by any Senator on the pending motion, and the motion to limit debate shall be decided without debate."

After debate,

On motion by Mr. Vickers, to amend the resolution by inserting after the word "thereto," the words "germane to the subject matter of the bill."

[Several proposed amendments to this part of the resolution are omitted.]

On motion by Mr. Edmunds, to amend the resolution by adding thereto the following:

"And no amendment to any such bill making legislative provisions other than such as directly relate to the appropriations contained in the bill shall be received."

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 25, nays 19.

[The names are omitted.]

So the amendment was agreed to.

The resolution having been further amended on motion of Mr. Scott, on the question to agree thereto as amended in the following words:

"Resolved, That during the present session it shall be in order to move a recess; and pending an appropriation bill to move to confine debate on amendment thereto to five minutes by any Senator on the pending motion, and such motions shall be decided without debate; and no amendment to any such bill making legislative provisions other than such as directly relate to the appropriations contained in the bill shall be received."

It was determined in the affirmative, {Yeas—33 / Nays—13}

[The names are omitted.]

So the resolution was agreed to.

[3d sess. 42d Cong., J. of S., 615, March 18, 1873.]

Mr. Wright submitted the following resolution for consideration, which was ordered to be printed:

"Resolved, That the Committee on the Revision of the Rules be instructed to inquire into the propriety of so amending the rules as to provide—

"First. That debate shall be confined and be relevant to the subject matter before the Senate;

"Second. That the previous question may be demanded either by a majority vote or in some modified form;

"Third. For taking up bills in their regular order on the calendar; for their disposition in such order; prohibiting special orders; and requiring that bills not finally disposed of when thus called shall go to the foot of the calendar, unless otherwise directed."

[Ib., 616, Mar. 19, 1873.]

On motion by Mr. Wright, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution submitted by him on the 17th instant instructing the Select Committee on the Revision of the Rules to inquire into the propriety of so amending the rules of the Senate as to confine debate to the subject matter before the Senate, to provide for a previous question, and the order of the consideration of bills on the calendar, and the disposition thereof;

After debate,

It was determined in the negative, {Yeas—25 / Nays—30}

[The names are omitted.]

So the motion to proceed to the consideration of the said resolution was not agreed to.

[CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 3d sess. 42d Cong. (spec. sess.), 113–117.]

[Ib., 617, Mar. 20, 1873.]

Mr. Wright submitted the following resolution for consideration; which was ordered to be printed:

"Resolved, That the following be added to the rules of the Senate:

"'RULE —. No debate shall be in order unless it relate to, or be pertinent to the question before the Senate.

"'RULE —. Debate may be closed at any time upon any bill or measure by the order of two-thirds of the Senators present, after notice of 24 hours to that effect.

"'RULE —. All bills shall be placed upon the calendar in their order, and shall be disposed of in such order unless postponed by the order of the Senate. All special orders are prohibited, except by unanimous consent; and bills postponed shall, unless otherwise ordered, go to the foot of the calendar.'"

[Ib., 618, Mar. 21, 1873.]

On motion by Mr. Wright, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution yesterday submitted by him, providing additional rules for the Senate.

After debate,

Ordered, That the further consideration of the subject be postponed to the first Monday of December next.

[CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 3d sess. 42d Cong. (spec. sess.), 135–137.]

[1st sess. 43d Cong., J. of S., 532, May 6, 1874.]

Mr. Edmunds submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Select Committee on the Revision of the Rules:

"Resolved, That the eleventh rule of the Senate be amended by adding thereto the following words: 'Nor shall such debate be allowed upon any motion to dispose of a pending matter and proceed to consider another. When a question is under consideration the debate thereon shall be germane to such question or to the subject to which it relates.'"

[Ib., 578, May 15, 1874.]

Mr. Ferry of Michigan, from the Select Committee on the Revision of the Rules, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. Edmunds the 6th instant, to amend the eleventh rule of the Senate, reported it with an amendment.

[2d sess. 43d Cong., J. of S., 128, Jan. 18, 1875.]

Mr. Morrill of Maine, submitted the following resolution for consideration, which was ordered to be printed:

"Resolved, That during the present session it shall be in order at any time to move a recess, and, pending an appropriation bill, to move to confine debate on amendments thereto to five minutes by any Senator on the pending motion, and such motions shall be decided without debate."

[Ib., 134, Jan. 19, 1875.]

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution yesterday submitted by Mr. Morrill of Maine, to limit debate on amendments to appropriation bills; and

After debate,

The resolution was agreed to, as follows:

"Resolved, That during the present session it shall be in order at any time to move a recess, and, pending an appropriation bill, to move to confine debate on amendments thereto to five minutes by any Senator on the pending motion, and such motion shall be decided without debate."

(CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 2d sess., 43d Cong., 560–570.)

[1st sess. 44th Cong., J. of S., 243, Feb. 28, 1876.]

Mr. Morrill of Maine, submitted the following resolution for consideration, which was ordered to be printed:

"Resolved, That during the present session it shall be in order at any time to move a recess, and, pending an appropriation bill, to move to confine debate on amendments thereto to five minutes by any Senator on the pending motion, and such motion shall be decided without debate."

[Ib., 253, Feb. 29, 1876.]

On motion by Mr. Morrill of Maine,

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution yesterday submitted by him to confine debate on amendments to appropriation bills; and, having been amended on motion by Mr. Morrill of Maine,

On motion by Mr. Bayard, to further amend the resolution by adding thereto the following:

" But no amendment to an appropriation bill shall be in order which is not germane to such a bill,"

After debate,

It was determined in the negative, {Yeas---------- 25 / Nays---------- 28

[The names are omitted.]

So the amendment was not agreed to.

No further amendment being proposed, the resolution as amended was agreed to, as follows:

"Resolved, That during the present session it shall be in order at any time to move a recess, and, pending an appropriation bill, to move to confine debate on amendments thereto to five minutes by any Senator on the pending motion, and such motions shall be decided without debate."

[2d sess. 45th Cong., J. of S., 314, Mar. 20, 1878.]

Mr. Windom submitted the following resolution for consideration:

"Resolved, That during the present session it shall be in order at any time pending an appropriation bill to move to confine debate on amendments thereto to five minutes by any Senator on the pending motion, and such motion shall be decided without debate."

[2d sess. 45th Cong., J. of S., 319, Mar. 21, 1878.]

On motion by Mr. Windom,

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution yesterday submitted by him, providing for a limitation of debate on amendments to appropriation bills, and

The resolution was agreed to.

[3d sess. 45th Cong., J. of S., 32, Dec. 5, 1878.]

Mr. Anthony submitted the following resolution for consideration:

"Resolved, That to-day, at 1 o'clock, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the calendar, and bills that are not objected to shall be taken up in their order, and each Senator shall be entitled to speak once, and for five minutes only, unless, upon motion, the Senate should at any time otherwise order; and the objection may be interposed at any stage of the proceedings; and this order shall take precedence of special orders or unfinished business unless otherwise ordered."

(The resolution went over, objection being made.)

[3d sess. 45th Cong., J. of S., 114, Jan. 14, 1879.]

Mr. Anthony submitted the following resolution, which was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

"Resolved, That on Friday next, at 1 o'clock, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the calendar, and bills that are not objected to shall be taken up in their order, and each Senator shall be entitled to speak once, and for five minutes only, unless, upon motion, the Senate should at any time otherwise order, and the objection may be interposed at any stage of the proceedings."

(CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 3d sess. 45th Cong., 427.)

[3d sess. 45th Cong., J. of S., 138, Jan. 20, 1879.]

Mr. Anthony submitted the following resolution, which was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

"Resolved, That at the conclusion of the morning business for each day after this day the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the calendar, and continue such consideration until half past 1 o'clock, and bills that are not objected to shall be taken up in their order, and each Senator shall be entitled to speak once, and for five minutes only, unless, upon motion, the Senate should at any time otherwise order, and the objection may be interposed at any stage of the proceedings."

[3d sess. 45th Cong., J. of S., 189, Jan. 30, 1879.]

Mr. Anthony submitted the following resolution for consideration:

"Resolved, That the order of the Senate of January 20, 1879, relative to the consideration of bills on the calendar shall not be suspended unless by unanimous consent or upon one day's notice."

On motion by Mr. Allison,

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. Windom on the 20th instant to confine debate on amendments to general appropriation bills; and

The resolution was agreed to.

[2d sess. 46th Cong., J. of S., 594, May 22, 1880.]

The hour of half past 12 o'clock having arrived, the President pro tempore asked the Senate to place its construction upon the order of February 5, 1880, and known as the "Anthony rule," and submitted the following proposition: " Does the consideration of the calendar continue until half past 1 o'clock, notwithstanding the change of the hour of meeting of the Senate? "

[3d sess. 46th Cong., J. of S., 244, Feb. 12, 1881.]

On motion by Mr. Morgan,

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by him the 10th instant, limiting debate on a motion to proceed to the consideration of a bill or resolution; and having been modified on the motion of Mr. Morgan, the resolution as modified was agreed to, as follows:

"Resolved, That for the remainder of the present session, on a motion to take up a bill or resolution for consideration, at the present or at a future time, debate shall be limited to 15 minutes, and no Senator shall speak to such motion more than once, or for a longer time than 5 minutes."

[3d sess. 46th Cong., J. of S., 234, Feb. 10, 1881.]

Mr. Morgan submitted the following resolution for consideration:

"Resolved, That on a motion to take up a bill or resolution for consideration at the present or at a future time debate shall be limited to 15 minutes, and no Senator shall speak to such motion oftener than once, or for a longer time than 5 minutes."

[1st sess. 47th Cong., J. of S., 446, Mar. 20, 1882.]

On motion of Mr. Anthony, to amend the order of the Senate known as the "Anthony rule," so as to extend the time for the consideration of the calendar of bills and resolutions until 2 o'clock p. m., it was determined in the affirmative.

[1st sess. 47th Cong., J. of S., 632, Apr. 26, 1882.]

Mr. Edmunds submitted the following resolution for consideration, which was ordered to be printed:

"Resolved, That the special rule of the Senate for the consideration of matters on the calendar under limited debate be, and the same is hereby, abolished."

Mr. Hoar submitted the following resolution for consideration, which was ordered to be printed:

"Resolved, That the resolve known as the "Anthony rule" shall not hereafter be so construed as to authorize the consideration of any measure under a limitation of debate of five minutes, or to speaking but once by each Senator after objection."

[2d sess. 47th Cong., J. of S., 282, Feb. 3, 1883.]

Mr. Hale submitted the following resolution for consideration, which was ordered to be printed:

"Resolved, That upon each amendment hereafter offered to the bill entitled 'An act to reduce internal revenue taxation,' each Senator may speak once for five minutes, and no more."

[2d sess. 47th Cong., J. of S., 396, Feb. 23, 1883.]

Mr. Hale submitted the following resolution for consideration:

"Resolved, That during the present session it shall be in order at any time pending an appropriation bill to move to confine debate on amendments thereto to five minutes by any Senator on the pending motion, and said motion shall be decided without debate."

[1st sess. 48th Cong., J. of S., 354, Feb. 26, 1884.]

Mr. Harris submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Rules and ordered to be printed:

"Resolved, That the seventh rule of the Senate be amended by adding thereto the following words:

" 'The Presiding Officer may at any time lay, and it shall be in order at any time for a Senator to move to lay, before the Senate any bill or other matter sent to the Senate by the President or the House of Representatives, and any question pending at that time shall be suspended for this purpose. Any motion so made shall be determined without debate.' "

Mr. Harris submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Rules and ordered to be printed:

"Resolved, That the eighth rule of the Senate be amended by adding thereto the following words:

" 'All motions made before 2 o'clock to proceed to the consideration of any matter shall be determined without debate.' "

[1st sess. 48th Cong., J. of S., 442, Mar. 19, 1884.]

On motion by Mr. Harris,

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution to amend the eighth rule; and

The resolution was agreed to, as follows:

"Resolved, That the eighth rule of the Senate be amended by adding thereto the following words: 'All motions made before 2 o'clock to proceed to the consideration of any matter shall be determined without debate.' "

On motion by Mr. Harris,

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolutions reported from the Committee on Rules on the 7th instant to amend the tenth rule, and having been amended on the motion of Mr. Harris, from the Committee on Rules, by inserting, after the word " order," the words " or to proceed to the consideration of other business."

The resolution as amended was agreed to, as follows:

"Resolved, That the tenth rule of the Senate be amended by adding thereto the following words: 'And all motions to change such order or to proceed to the consideration of other business shall be decided without debate.' "

[1st sess. 48th Cong., J. of S., 431, Mar. 17, 1884.]

Mr. Harris, from the Committee on Rules, to which was referred the resolution submitted by him February 26, 1884, to amend the seventh rule of the Senate, reported it without amendment.

The Senate proceeded, by unanimous consent, to consider the said resolution; and

Resolved, That the Senate agree thereto.

Mr. Harris, from the Committee on Rules, to which was referred the resolution submitted by him February 26, 1884, to amend the eighth rule of the Senate, reported it without amendment.

Mr. Harris, from the Committee on Rules, reported the following resolution for consideration:

"Resolved, That the tenth rule of the Senate be amended by adding thereto the following words: 'And all motions to change such order shall be decided without debate.' "

[2d sess. 48th Cong., J. of S., 359, Feb. 24, 1885.]

Mr. Allison submitted the following order for consideration, which was ordered to be printed:

Ordered, That during the remainder of the present session of the Senate it shall be in order to move at any time that debate on any amendment or all amendments to any appropriation bill then before the Senate be limited to five minutes for each Senator, and that no Senator shall speak more than once on the same amendment in form or substance. The question on such motion shall be determined without debate.

[2d sess. 48th Cong., J. of S., 389, Feb. 26, 1885.]

Mr. Hoar submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Rules and ordered to be printed:

"Resolved, That the Rules of the Senate be amended by adding as follows:

"When any bill or resolution shall have been under consideration for a reasonable time it shall be in order for any Senator to demand that debate thereon be closed. If such demand be seconded by a majority of the Senators present, the question shall forthwith be taken thereon without further debate, and the pending measure shall take precedence of all other business whatever. If the Senate shall decide to close debate, the question shall be put upon the pending amendments, upon amendments of which notice shall then be given, and upon the measure in its successive stages, according to the rules of the Senate, but without further debate, except that every Senator who may desire shall be permitted to speak upon the measure not more than once and not exceeding 30 minutes.

"After such demand shall have been made by any Senator, no other motion shall be in order until the same shall have been voted upon by the Senate, unless the same shall fail to be seconded.

"After the Senate shall have decided to close debate, no motion shall be in order but a motion to adjourn or to take a recess, when such motion shall be seconded by a majority of the Senate. When either of said motions shall have been lost, or shall have failed of a second, it shall not be in order to renew the same until one Senator shall have spoken upon the pending measure or one vote on the same shall have intervened."

[1st sess. 51st Cong., J. of S., 463, Aug. 12, 1890.]

Mr. Edmunds submitted the following order for consideration; which was ordered to be printed:

"Ordered, That during the consideration of House bill 9416, entitled 'An act to reduce the revenue and equalize duties on imports, and for other purposes,' no Senator shall speak more than once, and not longer than five minutes, on or in respect of any one item in said bill or any amendment proposed thereto without leave of the Senate, such leave to be granted or denied without debate and without any other motion or proceeding other than such as relates to procuring a quorum when it shall appear on a division, or on the yeas and nays being taken, that a voting quorum is not present; and until said bill shall have been gone through with to the point of a third reading no general motion in respect of said bill other than to take it up shall be in order.

"All appeals pending the matter aforesaid shall be determined at once, and without debate.

"Notice is hereby given, pursuant to Rule XL, that the foregoing order will be offered for adoption in the Senate.

"It is proposed to suspend for the foregoing stated purpose the following rules, namely: V, VIII, IX, X, XII, XVIII, XIX, XXII, XXVII, XXVIII, XXXV, and XL."

Mr. Blair submitted the following resolution for consideration, which was ordered to be printed:

"Resolved, That the following rule be adopted to fix the limit of debate, namely:

"'RULE —. When a proposition has been under debate two days and not less than four hours, which shall be determined by the Presiding Officer without debate, it shall be in order to move the previous question, unless the Senate shall otherwise fix the time when debate shall cease and the vote be taken; and in any case arising under this rule the Senator in charge of the measure shall have one hour in which to close the debate.

"'During the last 14 days preceding the time fixed by law or by concurrent resolution passed by the Senate for the end of the session, a majority of the Senate may close the debate at any time, subject to the right of the Senator in charge of the measure; and any motion for the previous question, or to limit debate and to fix the time for the vote to be taken, shall cease in one hour and be subject to the Anthony rule.'"

[1st sess. 51st Cong., J. of S., 643, Aug. 12, 1890.]

Mr. Quay submitted the following resolution for consideration, which was ordered to be printed:

"Resolved, That during the present session of Congress the Senate will not take up for consideration any legislative business other than the pending bill (the tariff bill) and general appropriation bills, bills relating to public buildings and public lands, and Senate or concurrent resolutions.

"Resolved, That the consideration of all bills other than such as are mentioned in the foregoing resolution is hereby postponed until the session of Congress to be held on the first Monday in December, 1890.

"Resolved, That the vote on the pending bill and all amendments thereto shall be taken on the 30th day of August instant at 2 o'clock p. m., the voting to continue without further debate until the consideration of the bill and the amendments is completed."

[1st sess. 51st Cong., J. of S., 465, Aug. 13, 1890.]

The President pro tempore laid before the Senate the order and resolutions yesterday submitted, as follows:

Order by Mr. Edmunds, to limit debate on the pending bill to reduce the revenue and equalize duties on imports and the amendments proposed thereto.

Resolution by Mr. Blair, to amend the rules so as to fix a limit to debate.

Resolution by Mr. Quay, prescribing the measure to be considered during the remainder of the present session; and.

Ordered, That they be referred to the Committee on Rules.

[1st sess. 51st Cong., J. of S., 471, Aug. 16, 1890.]

Mr. Quay gave notice in writing, pursuant to Rule XL, that he would offer the following orders for adoption by the Senate:

"Ordered, 1. That during the present session of Congress the Senate will not take up for consideration any legislative business other than the pending bill (H. R. 9416), conference reports, general appropriation bills, pension bills, bills relating to the public lands, to the United States courts, to the Postal Service, to agriculture and forestry, to public buildings, and Senate or concurrent resolutions.

"Ordered, 2. That the consideration of all bills other than such as are mentioned in the foregoing order is hereby postponed until the session of Congress to be held on the first Monday of December, 1890.

"Ordered, 3. That a vote shall be taken on the bill (H. R. 9416) now under consideration in the Senate and upon amendments then pending, without further debate, on the 30th day of August, 1890, the voting to commence at 2 o'clock p. m. on said day and continue on that and subsequent days, to the exclusion of all other business, until the bill and pending amendments are finally disposed of.

"And that it was proposed to modify, for the foregoing stated purpose, the following rules, namely: VII, VIII, IX, X, XII, XIX, XXII, XXVII, XXVIII, XXXV, and XL.

"Ordered, That the notice, with the proposed orders, be printed."

[1st sess. 51st Cong., J. of S., 472, Aug. 18, 1890.]

Mr. Quay, pursuant to notice, submitted the following resolution, which was ordered to be printed:

"Resolved, That the following orders be adopted for the government of the Senate during the present session of Congress:

"'Ordered, 1. That during the present session of Congress the Senate will not take up for consideration any legislative business other than the pending bill (H. R. 9416), conference reports, general appropriation bills, pension bills, bills relating to the public lands, to the United States courts, to the Postal Service, to agriculture and forestry, to public buildings, and Senate or concurrent resolutions.

"'Ordered, 2. That the consideration of all bills other than such as are mentioned in the foregoing order is hereby postponed until the session of Congress to be held on the first Monday of December, 1890.

"'Ordered, 3. That a vote shall be taken on the bill (H. R. 9416) now under consideration in the Senate and upon amendments then pending, without further debate, on the 30th day of August, 1890, the voting to commence at 2 o'clock p. m. on said day and to continue on that and subsequent days, to the exclusion of all other business, until the bill and pending amendments are finally disposed of.

"'For the foregoing stated purpose the following rules, namely, VII, VIII, IX, X, XII, XIX, XXII, XXVII, XXVIII, XXXV, and XL, are modified.'"

[1st sess. 51st Cong., J. of S., 476, Aug. 20, 1890.]

The President pro tempore laid before the Senate the resolution submitted by Mr. Quay on the 18th instant, as follows:

"Resolved, That the following orders be adopted for the government of the Senate during the present term of Congress:

"'Ordered, 1. That during the present session of Congress the Senate will not take up for consideration any legislative business other than the pending bill (H. R. 9416), conference reports, general appropriation bills, pension bills, bills relating to public lands, United States courts, the Postal Service, to agriculture and forestry, to public buildings, and Senate or concurrent resolutions.

"'Ordered, 2. That the consideration of all bills other than such as are mentioned in the foregoing order is hereby postponed until the session of Congress to be held on the first Monday of December, 1890.

"'Ordered, 3. That a vote shall be taken on the bill (H. R. 9416) now under consideration in the Senate and upon amendments then pending, without further debate, on the 30th day of August, 1890, the voting to commence at 2 o'clock p. m. on said day and to continue on that and subsequent days, to the exclusion of all other business, until the bill and pending amendments are finally disposed of.

"'For the foregoing stated purpose the following rules, namely, VII, VIII, IX, X, XII, XIX, XXII, XXVII, XXVIII, XXXV, and XL, are modified.'"

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution; and an amendment having been proposed by Senator Hoar, viz: Strike out all after the word "resolved," and in lieu thereof insert "that the rules of the Senate be amended by adding the following:

"When any bill or resolution shall have been under consideration for a reasonable time it shall be in order for any Senator to demand that debate thereon be closed. If such demand be seconded by a majority of the Senators present, the question shall forthwith be taken thereon without further debate, and the pending measures shall take precedence of all other business whatever. If the Senate shall decide to close debate, the question shall be put upon the pending amendments, upon amendments of which notice will then be given, and upon the measure in its successive stages, according to the rules of the Senate, but without further debate, except that every Senator who may desire shall be permitted to speak upon a measure not more than once and not exceeding one hour.

"After such demand shall have been made by any Senator no other motion shall be in order until the same shall have been voted upon by the Senate, unless the same shall fail to be seconded.

"After the Senate shall have decided to close debate, no motion shall be in order but a motion to adjourn or to take recess, when such motion shall be seconded by a majority of the Senate. When either of said motions shall have been lost or shall have failed of a second, it shall not be in order to renew the same until one Senator shall have spoken upon the pending measure or one vote upon the same shall have intervened.

"For the foregoing stated purpose the following rules, namely, VII, VIII, IX, X, XII, XIX, XXII, XXVII, XXVIII, XXXV, and XL are modified."

On motion by Mr. Hoar to amend the part proposed to be stricken out by inserting, after the words "the pending bill (H. R. 9416)," the words "the bill to amend and supplement the election laws of the United States (H. R. 11045)," and by adding, at the end of the resolutions, the words "and immediately thereafter the bill to amend and supplement the election laws of the United States shall be taken up for consideration, and shall remain before the Senate every day for three days, after the reading of the Journal, to the exclusion of all other business, and on the 4th day of September, at 2 o'clock, voting thereon, and on the then pending amendments, shall begin and shall continue from day to day, to the exclusion of other business, until the same are finally disposed of."

After debate,

On motion by Mr. Spooner, that the resolution, with the proposed amendment, be referred to the Committee on Rules,

Pending debate,

The President pro tempore announced that the hour of 12 o'clock had arrived, and laid before the Senate the unfinished business at its adjournment yesterday, viz, the bill (H. R. 9416) to reduce the revenue and equalize duties on imports, and for other purposes.

[CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 1st sess. 51st Cong., 8841–8849.]

[1st sess. 51st Cong., J. of S., Sept. 23, 1890.]

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. Quay August 18, 1890, prescribing an order of business during the remainder of the present session; and Ordered, That it be postponed indefinitely.

[2d sess. 51st Cong., J. of S., 46, Dec. 23, 1890.]

Mr. Aldrich gave notice, in accordance with the provisions of Rule XL, that he would move certain amendments to the rules, which would modify Rules VII, VIII, IX, X, XII, XIX, XXII, XXVII, XXXV, and XL, and for that purpose he would hereafter submit the following resolution:

"Resolved, That for the remainder of this session the rules of the Senate be amended by adding thereto the following:

"'When any bill, resolution, or other question shall have been under consideration for a reasonable time it shall be in order for any Senator to demand that debate thereon be closed. On such demand no debate shall be in order, and pending such demand no other motion, except one motion to adjourn, shall be made. If such demand be seconded by a majority of the Senators present, the question shall forthwith be taken thereon without debate. If the Senate shall decide to close debate on the bill, resolution, or other question, the measure shall take precedence of all other business whatever, and the question shall be put upon the amendments, if any, then pending, and upon the measure in its successive stages, according to the rules of the Senate, but without further debate, except that every Senator who may desire shall be permitted to speak upon the measure, including all amendments, not more than once, and not exceeding 30 minutes.

"'After the Senate shall have decided to close debate as herein provided no motion shall be in order but a motion to adjourn or to take a recess, when such motion shall be seconded by a majority of the Senate. When either of said motions shall have been lost, or shall have failed of a second, it shall not be in order to renew the same until one Senator shall have spoken upon the pending measure, or one vote upon the same shall have intervened.

"'Pending proceedings under the foregoing rule no proceeding in respect of a quorum shall be in order until it shall have appeared on a division or on the taking of the yeas and nays that a quorum is not present and voting.

"'Pending proceedings under the foregoing rule, all questions of order, whether on appeal or otherwise, shall be decided without debate, and no obstructive or dilatory motion or proceeding of any kind shall be in order.

"'For the foregoing stated purposes the following rules, namely, VII, VIII, IX, XII, XIX, XXII, XXVII, XXVIII, XXXV, and XL, are modified.'"

Ordered, That the proposed resolution be printed.

[2d sess. 51st Cong., J. of S., 51, Dec. 29, 1890.]

Mr. Aldrich, pursuant to notice given on the 23d instant, submitted the following resolution, which was ordered to be printed:

"Resolved, That for the remainder of this session the rules of the Senate be amended by adding thereto the following:

"'When any bill, resolution, or other question shall have been under consideration for a considerable time it shall be in order for any Senator to demand that debate thereon be closed. On such demand no debate shall be in order, and pending such demand no other motion, except one motion to adjourn, shall be made. If such demand be seconded by a majority of the Senators present, the question shall forthwith be taken thereon without debate. If the Senate shall decide to close debate on any bill, resolution, or other question, the measure shall take precedence of all other business whatever, and the question shall be put upon the amendments, if any, then pending, and upon the measure in its successive stages, according to the rules of the Senate, but without further debate, except that every Senator who may desire shall be permitted to speak upon the measure, including all amendments, not more than once, and not exceeding 30 minutes.

"'After the Senate shall have decided to close debate as herein provided, no motion shall be in order but a motion to adjourn or to take a recess, when such motions shall be seconded by a majority of the Senate. When either of said motions shall have been lost or shall have failed of a second, it shall not be in order to renew the same until one Senator shall have spoken upon the pending measure, or one vote upon the same shall have intervened.

"'Pending proceedings under the foregoing rule, no proceeding in respect of the quorum shall be in order until it shall have appeared on a division, or on the taking of the yeas and nays, that a quorum is not present and voting.

"'Pending proceedings under the foregoing rule, all questions of order, whether upon appeal or otherwise, shall be decided without debate, and no obstructive or dilatory motion or proceedings of any kind shall be in order.

"'For the foregoing stated purposes the following rules, namely, VII, VIII, IX, X, XII, XIX, XXII, XXVII, XXVIII, XXXV, and XL, are modified.'"

[2d sess. 51st Cong., J. of S., 87, Jan. 20, 1891.]

On motion by Mr. Aldrich, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution submitted by him December 29, 1890, to amend the rules so as to provide a limitation of debate under certain conditions, and for that purpose to modify Rules VII, VIII, IX, X, XII, XIX, XXII, XXVII, XXVIII, XXXV, and XL.

It was determined in the affirmative;

When,

Mr. Harris raised a question of order, namely, that the notice given by Mr. Aldrich was not sufficiently specific to meet the requirements of Rule XL, as it did not specify the parts of the rules proposed to be suspended, modified, or amended, and the purposes thereof, and that the proposed rule materially modifies Rules V and XX, and neither of these rules are mentioned in the notice as rules proposed to be suspended, modified, or amended.

Pending which [the hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, etc.].

[CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 2d sess. 51st Cong., 1564–1568.]

[2d sess. 51st Cong., J. of S., 89, Jan. 22, 1891.]

On motion by Mr. Aldrich, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution submitted by him December 29, 1890, to amend the rules so as to provide a limitation of debate under certain conditions, and for that purpose to modify Rules VII, VIII, IX, X, XII, XIX, XXII, XXVII, XXVIII, XXXV, and XL.

Mr. Harris raised a question of order, namely, that the unfinished business was the motion of Mr. Gorman, to correct the Journal of the day before yesterday, it being a question of the highest privilege, and under Rule III to be proceeded with until it is concluded.

The Vice President overruled the question of order, and stated that he did not find any rule bearing upon the question of amending or approving any other Journal than that of the preceding day, and is therefore of the opinion that the motion made by the Senator from Rhode Island was in order, the morning hour having expired.

From the decision of the Chair Mr. Harris appealed to the Senate; and,

On the question, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?"

It was determined in the affirmative, {Yeas—35 / Nays—30}

On motion by Mr. Cockrell,
The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,
[The names are omitted.]
So the decision of the Chair was sustained.
[CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 2d sess. 51st Cong., 1654–1664.]

[2d sess. 51st Cong., J. of S., 90, Jan. 22, 1891.]

The question recurring on the motion of Mr. Aldrich, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution;
On motion by Mr. Gorman, to lay the motion on the table,
It was determined in the negative, {Yeas 30 / Nays 35}
On motion by Mr. Gorman,
The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,
[The names are omitted.]
So the motion to lay on the table was not agreed to.
Mr. Ransom raised a question of order, namely, that the motion to take up the resolution was not in order because the Journal of the 20th instant as read on the 21st shows that the resolution was taken up on the 20th, and if that be true, it then became and now is the unfinished business.
The Vice President overruled the question of order.
From the decision of the Chair Mr. Ransom appealed to the Senate; and,
On the question, "Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?"
It was determined in the affirmative, {Yeas 36 / Nays 27}
On motion by Mr. Ransom,
The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,
Those who voted in the affirmative are,
[The names are omitted.]
So the question of order was overruled.
Mr. Gorman asked that the motion of Mr. Aldrich be put in writing.
The motion having been reduced to writing, and the question recurring on agreeing to the same,
It was determined in the affirmative, {Yeas 36 / Nays 32}
On motion by Mr. Aldrich,
The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,
[The names are omitted.]
So the motion was agreed to; and
The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution; and
The question being on the point of order raised by Mr. Harris on the 20th instant, namely, that the notice given by Mr. Aldrich was not sufficiently specific to meet the requirements of Rule XL, as it did not specify the parts of the rules supposed to be suspended, modified, or amended, and the purposes thereof; and that the proposed rule materially modifies Rules V and XX, and neither of these rules is mentioned in the notice as rules proposed to be suspended, modified, or amended,
The Vice President overruled the question of order, and decided that it was not well taken, as in the opinion of the Chair the purpose and spirit of the rule are stated in the resolution submitted by Mr. Aldrich.
From the decision of the Chair Mr. Faulkner appealed to the Senate, and
After debate,
At 2 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m., Mr. Gorman raised a question as to the presence of a quorum;
Whereupon,
The Presiding Officer (Mr. Manderson in the chair) directed the roll to be called,
When
Fifty-one Senators answered to their names.
A quorum being present, and the question recurring upon the appeal taken by Mr. Faulkner from the decision of the Chair,
After further debate,
On motion by Mr. Aldrich that the appeal lie on the table,
Mr. Gorman asked that the motion be put in writing; and
The motion having been reduced to writing by Mr. Aldrich,
On the question to agree to the same,
It was determined in the affirmative, {Yeas 33 / Nays 28}
On motion by Mr. Gorman,
The yeas and nays being desired by one-fifth of the Senators present,
[The names are omitted.]
So the motion was not agreed to.
The question recurring on agreeing to the resolution submitted by Mr. Aldrich,
Pending debate.
(CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 2d sess. 51st Cong., 1664–1682.)

[2d sess. 51st Cong., J. of S., 91, Jan. 22, 1891.]

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. Aldrich, to amend the rules so as to provide a limitation of debate.
An amendment having been proposed by Mr. Stewart,
On motion by Mr. Faulkner, the yeas and nays were ordered.
Pending debate.
On motion by Mr. Aldrich, at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.,
The Senate took a recess until 12 m., Monday.

MONDAY, 12 o'clock m.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. Aldrich to amend the rules so as to provide a limitation of debate; and
The question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. Stewart.
[CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 2d sess. 51st Cong., 1682–1738.]

[2d sess. 51st Cong., J. of S., 91, Jan. 22, 1891.]

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion submitted by Mr. Gorman to amend the Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, the 20th instant, by striking out, after the motion submitted by Mr. Aldrich, that the Senate resume the consideration of the resolution to amend the rules so as to provide a limitation of debate, the words "It was determined in the affirmative"; when,
By unanimous consent, the order for the yeas and nays was withdrawn; and,
The motion to amend having been agreed to,
The Journal was approved.
The Senate resumed the consideration of the question of the approval of the Journal of the proceedings of Wednesday, the 21st instant; and
The Journal was approved.

[2d sess. 51st Cong., J. of S., 178, Feb. 26, 1891.]

On motion by Mr. Allison,
The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13462) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1892, and for other purposes;
When,
On motion by Mr. Allison, and by unanimous consent,
Ordered, That during the consideration of the pending bill debate on amendments thereto shall be limited to five minutes for each Senator on the pending question, and that no Senator shall speak more than once on the same amendment.

Mr. OWEN. Now, Mr. President, that record which I have submitted without reading comes down to 1891, when Mr. Aldrich proposed a cloture rule for the limitation of debate. I want to call attention to several other propositions which have been made since that time, one by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], now representing the State of New Hampshire in this body, on October 14, 1893, found on page 2504 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Fifty-third Congress, first session, as follows:

When any bill or resolution reported from a standing or select committee is under consideration, if a majority of the entire membership of the Senate submit a request in writing, through the Chair, that debate close, such papers shall be referred to the Committee on Rules, and it shall be the duty of said committee within a period not exceeding five days from the date of said reference to report an order naming a day and hour when a vote shall be taken, and action upon said report shall be had without amendment or debate.

Senator GALLINGER was very much in favor of a cloture in those days.

Senator Hoar also proposed a resolution on cloture. Nor were they alone in that respect as distinguished leaders of the opposition, but Senator LODGE also proposed the following rule in order to prevent the abuse of the floor of the Senate:

And it shall not be in order at any time for any Senator to read a speech, either written or printed.

Senator Vest, of Missouri, in 1893 introduced the following resolution, the most moderate form of terminating so-called debate (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 45, Dec. 5, 1894):

Amendment intended to be proposed to the rules of the Senate, namely, add to Rule I the following section:
"SEC. 2. Whenever any bill, motion, or resolution is pending before the Senate as unfinished business and the same shall have been debated on divers days, amounting in all to 30, it shall be in order for any Senator to move that a time be fixed for the taking of a vote upon such bill, motion, or resolution, and such motion shall not be amendable or debatable, but shall be immediately put; and if adopted by a majority vote of all the Members of the Senate, the vote upon such bill, motion, or resolution, with all the amendments thereto which may have been proposed at the time of such motion, shall be had at the date fixed in such original motion without further debate or amendment, except by unanimous consent, and during the pendency of such motion to fix a date, and also at the time fixed by the Senate for voting upon such bill, motion, or resolution no other business of any kind or character shall be entertained, except by unanimous consent, until such motion, bill, or resolution shall have been finally acted upon."

Hon. Orville H. Platt, on September 21, 1893, introduced the following resolution (p. 1636):

Whenever any bill or resolution is pending before the Senate as unfinished business the presiding officer shall, upon the written request of a majority of the Senators, fix a day and hour, and notify the Senate thereof, when general debate shall cease thereon, which time shall not be less than five days from the submission of such request, and he shall also fix a subsequent day and hour, and notify the Senate thereof, when the vote shall be taken on the bill or resolution and any amendment thereto without further debate, the time for taking the vote to be not more than two days later than the time when general debate is to cease, and in the interval between the closing of general debate and the taking of the vote no Senator shall speak more than five minutes nor more than once upon the same proposition.

And, among other things, said:

The rules of the Senate, as of every legislative body, ought to facilitate the transaction of business. I think that proposition will not be denied. The rules of the Senate as they stand to-day make it impossible, or nearly impossible, to transact business. I think that proposition will not be denied. We as a Senate are fast losing the respect of the people of the United States. We are fast being considered a body that exists for the purpose of retarding and obstructing legislation. We are being compared in the minds of the people of this country to the House of Lords in England, and the reason for it is that under our rules it is impossible or nearly impossible to obtain action when there is any considerable opposition to a bill here.
I think that I may safely say that there is a large majority upon this side of the Senate who would favor the adoption of such a rule at the present time.

Mr. Hoar, of Massachusetts (1893), submitted to the committee a proposed substitute, as follows (p. 1637):

Resolved, That the rules of the Senate be amended by adding the following:
"When any bill or resolution shall have been under consideration for more than one day it shall be in order for any Senator to demand that debate thereon be closed. If such demand be seconded by a majority of the Senators present, the question shall forthwith be taken thereon without further debate, and the pending measure shall take precedence of all other business whatever. If the Senate shall decide to close debate, the question shall be put upon the pending amendments, upon amendments of which notice shall then be given, and upon the measure in its successive stages according to the rules of the Senate, but without further debate, except that every Senator who may desire shall be permitted to speak upon the measure not more than once and not exceeding one hour.

"After such demand shall have been made by any Senator no other motion shall be in order until the same shall have been voted upon by the Senate, unless the same shall fail to be seconded.

"After the Senate shall have decided to close debate no motion shall be in order, but a motion to adjourn or to take a recess, when such motion shall be seconded by a majority of the Senate. When either of said motions shall have been lost or shall have failed of a second it shall not be in order to renew the same until one Senator shall have spoken upon the pending measure or one vote upon the same shall have intervened.

"For the foregoing stated purpose the following rules, namely, VII, VIII, IX, X, XII, XIX, XXII, XXVII, XXVIII, XXXV, and XL, are modified."

Mr. LODGE, of Massachusetts, also then, as now, Senator of the United States from Massachusetts, supported this proposal, using the following language (p. 1637):

It is because I believe that the moment for action has arrived that I desire now simply to say a word expressive of my very strong belief in the principle of the resolution offered by the Senator from Connecticut, Mr. Platt.

We govern in this country in our representative bodies by voting and debate. It is most desirable to have them both. Both are of great importance. But if we are to have only one, then the one which leads to action is the more important. To vote without debating may be hasty, may be ill considered, may be rash, but to debate and never vote is imbecility.

I am well aware that there are measures now pending, measures with reference to the tariff, which I consider more injurious to the country than the financial measure now before us. I am aware that there is a measure which has been rushed into the House of Representatives at the very moment when they are calling on us Republicans for nonpartisanship which is partisan in the highest degree and which involves evils which I regard as infinitely worse than anything that can arise from any economic measure, because it is a blow at human rights and personal liberty. I know that those measures are at hand. I know that such a rule as is now proposed will enable a majority surely to put them through this body after due debate and will lodge in the hands of a majority the power and the high responsibility which I believe the majority ought always to have. But, Mr. President, I do not shrink from the conclusion in the least. If it is right now to take a step like this, as I believe it is, in order to pass a measure which the whole country is demanding, then, as it seems to me, it is right to pass it for all measures. If it is not right for this measure, then it is not right to pass it for any other.

I believe that the most important principle in our Government is that the majority should rule. It is for that reason that I have done what lay in my power to promote what I thought was for the protection of elections, because I think the majority should rule at the ballot box. I think equally that the majority should rule on this floor—not by violent methods, but by proper dignified rules, such as are proposed by my colleague and by the Senator from Connecticut. The country demands action and we give them words. For these reasons, Mr. President, I have ventured to detain the Senate in order to express my most cordial approbation of the principle involved in the proposed rules which have just been referred to the committee.

Senator David B. Hill, of New York (1893), proposed the following amendment (p. 1639):

Add to Rule IX the following section:

"SEC. 2. Whenever any bill or resolution is pending before the Senate as unfinished business and the same shall have been debated on divers days amounting in all to 30 days, it shall be in order for any Senator to move to fix a date for the taking of a vote upon such bill or resolution, and such motion shall not be amended or debatable; and if passed by a majority of all the Senators elected the vote upon such bill or resolution, with all the amendments thereto which may be pending at the time of such motion, shall be immediately had without further debate or amendment, except by unanimous consent."

Only last Congress, April 6, 1911, the distinguished Senator from New York, Mr. ROOT, introduced the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Rules be, and it is hereby, instructed to report for the consideration of the Senate a rule or rules to secure more effective control by the Senate over its procedure, and especially over its procedure upon conference reports and upon bills which have been passed by the House and have been favorably reported in the Senate. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 47, pt. 1, p. 107.)

And Senator LODGE argued very strongly in favor of a cloture.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator will turn to pages 1637 and 1638 of the same volume that he holds in his hands, he will find, if my memory serves me right, a resolution upon the subject offered by Mr. LODGE, or else a speech in favor of a resolution previously offered by Senator Platt—a speech which contains a great deal of matter which is pertinent to the present situation.

Mr. OWEN. Senator Platt, on the 20th of September, 1893, proposed the following resolution:

Resolved, That Rule IX of the Senate be amended by adding the following section:

"SEC. 2. Whenever and bill or resolution is pending before the Senate as unfinished business the Presiding Officer shall, upon the written request of a majority of the Senators, fix a day and hour and notify the Senate thereof when general debate shall cease thereon, which time shall not be less than five days from the submission of the request, and he shall also fix a subsequent day and hour, and notify the Senate thereof, when the vote shall be taken on the bill or resolution and any amendment thereto without further debate; the time for taking the vote to be not more than two days later than the time when general debate is to cease, and in the interval between the closing of general debate and the taking of the vote no Senator shall speak more than five minutes or more than once upon the same proposition.

Senator Platt argued strongly for this; nor was he alone. Senator LODGE, on page 2536, made an argument in favor of cloture, to this effect:

I believe, of course, that the proper way is to go straight at it and to put in the hands of the majority of the Senate the power to close debate and the power to take a vote after due debate.

But as it appears that there is not a majority in the Senate for closure, as no action has been taken by the Committee on Rules in that direction, and as there appears to be a prejudice against any method of bringing the Senate to a vote because it is in conflict with Senate traditions, I have ventured to offer two amendments which I think will at least tend to prevent obstruction, although they are not as thorough and complete as they ought to be.

This question of obstruction has culminated in the great representative bodies of the English-speaking people within the last few years. It has been met and disposed of in the House of Commons by the closure rules, which recently have been applied in practice at every stage of the home-rule bill. It has been met and disposed of in the House of Representatives. Those two great representative bodies of the English-speaking people, owing to reforms which have been carried out within the last half dozen years, are able to-day to transact business, to transact it according to the will of the majority, and thereby to place upon the majority the public responsibility which they ought to bear.

And more to like effect from the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts.

The Senator from Massachusetts was not content with expressing himself in that respect in the United States Senate, but he wrote a very interesting article for the North American Review, in the issue of November, 1893, page 523, in which he sets up with great force the importance of allowing a majority to rule, in which he advocates the Reed rules in the House of Representatives, which since that time have been, wisely enough, adopted by every succeeding Congress, whether Democratic or Republican, because the common sense of a parliament requires that the majority shall not be throttled by the minority, for the simple reason the majority must be permitted to exercise the functions for which they are chosen by the American people, if representative government is to stand. I shall ask to put this short article by Mr. LODGE as an addendum to my remarks, if there is no objection. It is a very short one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. LODGE, after arguing strenuously for the cloture——

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator give the date of that article?

Mr. OWEN. November, 1893.

After arguing strenuously for the cloture, Mr. LODGE points out the practice of the previous question, and says:

But the essence of a system of courtesy is that it should be the same at all points. The two great rights in our representative bodies are voting and debate. If the courtesy of unlimited debate is granted, it must carry with it the reciprocal courtesy of permitting a vote after due discussion. If this is not the case, the system is impossible. Of the two rights, moreover, that of voting is the higher and more important. We ought to have both, and debate certainly in ample measure; but if we are forced to choose between them, the right of action must prevail over the right of discussion. To vote without debating is perilous, but to debate and never vote is imbecile.

I commend the language of the Senator from Massachusetts to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator has quoted an amendment to the rules which I wrote shortly after coming into this body, which was sent to the Committee on Rules and never came out of that committee. I did hold to that view at that time; but I listened to a wonderful speech from Senator Turpie, of Indiana, about that time in opposition to cloture, which did very much toward converting me to the opposite view.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] came into the Senate fresh from the House in 1893, imbued with the idea that the Reed rules were the acme of perfection, and he advocated that practice. It was during a famous debate on the repeal of the silver-purchase clause in the law that was then on the statute books, and our Democratic friends were filibustering against it with great earnestness and with a good deal of success.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I simply wish to remind the Senator from New Hampshire that that filibuster was not a party filibuster. There were a great many Senators upon the Republican side engaged in it. One was from my State, who afterwards took his seat upon this side. It was not a Democratic filibuster.

Mr. GALLINGER. There were four or five so-called Republicans at that time——

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, there were more than that, Mr. President, and there was nothing "so called" about them. They were Republicans.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for permitting me the opportunity of saying that when I first came here I did entertain the view the Senator has attributed to me; but I listened very attentively to the views of Senators, many of whom had been here a long time, and I found that they were almost unanimously against that procedure. They assured me that no harm had ever come from it, and I changed my views, and I have entertained those changed views from that day to the present time.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, against the views of Mr. Turpie, the Senator referred to by the Senator from New Hampshire, I wish to quote the language of another distinguished Senator of that date on the Democratic side—Senator White, now the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. He said, on October 13, 1893 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 2477), in commenting on the filibuster of that date:

> Sir, we have for days and days in this great body, upon which the eyes of the whole world have been turned in the past as the most exalted and the most dignified and the most responsible legislative body on the face of God's earth, witnessed scenes in it which, in my judgment, have made it an object of contempt to every civilized man and to every honest judgment. So far as I am concerned, I hope that this action to-night will initiate the first step to reach a point in which this great body, gathering its self-respect about it, will so deport itself as to save at least some of the honor and some of the character which has been its ornament for so many years. While it is sought to drag it down in the mire and dust, I hope it will so deport itself as to vindicate its duty. If gentlemen sit in this room and call attention to the absence of a quorum, and then remain silent on the roll called to ascertain whether there is a quorum, I hope there will be firmness and manhood here to visit that punishment which, in my judgment, such conduct deserves. If it be done, then, sir, those who use such methods will seek some other field for their display than this. If it be not done, the self-respect of this body is, in my judgment, gone.

Senator David B. Hill likewise objected very strongly to the abuse of the time of the Senate by the filibuster, and he was not alone in that. I call attention to the proposal of Senator Hill in 1893, page 1639:

> Add to Rule IX the following section:
> "SEC. 2. Whenever any bill or resolution is pending before the Senate as unfinished business and the same shall have been debated on divers days amounting in all to 30 days, it shall be in order for any Senator to move to fix a date for the taking of a vote upon such bill or resolution, and such motion shall not be amended or debatable; and if passed by a majority of all the Senators elected the vote upon such bill or resolution, with all the amendments thereto which may be pending at the time of such motion, shall be immediately had without further debate or amendment, except by unanimous consent."

Nor does this by any means end the matter on the two sides of the Chamber. There are many distinguished Senators who, in the course of the debates on these questions, expressed similar sentiments. I shall not encumber the RECORD with making quotations from them, except to show that the leaders on both sides of this Chamber, as the exigencies seemed to require, have not hesitated to urge amendment of the rules to provide for a previous question after reasonable debate has been had.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. WEEKS. I wish to ask the Senator if any Senator has ever made that contention when he was in the minority party of the Senate? Has it not always been when he was in the majority?

Mr. OWEN. Oh, I think so, very generally. That does not change the force of the opinions and arguments cited, however. If you gentlemen, through your leadership on that side, declare vehemently in favor of the virtue of a cloture when you are in the majority, and if the gentlemen on this side declare vigorously in favor of a cloture when they are in the majority, does it not argue that both sides have committed themselves earnestly to the reasonable, common-sense rule that the majority shall command this Chamber? And if both sides have committed themselves, with what face will you deny the reason of the rule which you have yourselves advocated with such force and with such earnestness? Do you wish to argue that both sides were fraudulently making the argument and that neither side is entitled to the respect of honest men, and that their opinions are worthless because merely indicating a desire for partisan advantage?

If this be true, let us follow the rule of all other great parliamentary bodies—of Great Britain, of France, of Germany, of Austria, of Italy, of Switzerland, of Hungary, of Spain, of Denmark—of the great States of our own Union, who do not permit filibuster or the rule of the minority over the majority.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. May I ask the Senator if he does not think that when the rule was originally adopted providing that a Senator could speak once in one day upon a question in debate, it was contemplated that the speech would be confined to the question pending and then before the Senate?

Mr. OWEN. Oh, absolutely. No one imagined in the early days of the Senate that the minority would have the shameless impudence to try to rule the majority.

Mr. FLETCHER. And does not the Senator think this abuse has grown up not because the rule ever contemplated such abuse, but rather in spite of it, and that the abuse consists largely in the fact that nowadays the so-called debate or discussion or speech is not confined at all to the question before the Senate, but all latitude is given for the discussion of any old subject at any old time, whether it is really before the Senate or not? Does not the Senator think that is really the abuse, and that that was never contemplated by the Senate when the rules were originally adopted?

Mr. OWEN. That is quite true. When the rules of the Senate were adopted in 1789 they had the "previous question" coming from the Continental Congress, which had the previous question coming from the Parliament of Great Britain, which had the previous question in 1690. The Senate maintained the previous question for 17 years. It was then a small body of very courteous men, only 34 in number, and they dropped the previous question as not needed in so small a body of such very courteous men. They had only used it three times in 17 years, and as a matter of courtesy they merely omitted the previous question from the printed rules. It still was permissible under the general parliamentary law. They never imagined the Senator from Ohio speaking for 9 hours, the Senator from California speaking for long hours on the shipping bill, but confining his rambling observations to a dissertation on Christian science, followed by the Senator from Utah by a 13-hour speech, and speech after speech consuming days for the shameless purpose of killing time and killing majority rule and defeating popular government.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him further?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will suggest to the Senator from Florida that if he should enforce that rule it would prevent the Senator from Oklahoma from making his very interesting discussion to-day.

Mr. OWEN. Oh, that may be true, Mr. President. I agree with the Senator from New Hampshire that a speech on the cloture would not be very much in point on the pending question of the shipping bill, but——

Mr. FLETCHER. But that is the pending question.

Mr. OWEN. Yes; it is so far in point that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] has moved a temporary, particular, and special cloture for the purpose of bringing to a conclusion the endless filibuster on that side of the Chamber and getting a vote on the shipping bill. I am not far afield in discussing cloture in this way, for cloture is needed to get the vote on the shipping bill.

Mr. FLETCHER. That is the precise question.

Mr. OWEN. I think I am really much more in point than the Senator from New Hampshire would indicate.

Mr. President, I wish to submit for the RECORD the practice of every State in the Union. I have in my hand a compilation of the rules on the "previous question" of the various States comprising this Republic, and I submit them to show that the common sense of the people of this Republic, the common sense moving the legislatures of the various States, has spoken in regard to this matter; and only when they have had no trouble from an unfair filibuster is there the absence of a rule of cloture; that is, where the rule of courtesy carries with it the reciprocal courtesy of permitting the majority to vote after reasonable debate has been had.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the insertion of the statement in the RECORD?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, before agreeing to the insertion I will ask the Senator, with his permission, if he has given the rules of the State senates as well as the houses of representatives?

Mr. OWEN. Yes; both are given—both the senate and house, wherever it occurs. I had it compiled by the legislative reference division of the Library of Congress for the use of the Senate.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will say to the Senator that I chance to know that we have not a previous question in the State Senate of New Hampshire.

Mr. OWEN. In the State Senate of New Hampshire, I take it, the Senator will not allege that any filibusters have been carried on so as to defeat the will of the majority. If so, I shall be glad to have the Senator say that that is a fact.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think probably the Senator is correct. We do not have before the Legislature of New Hampshire the great questions that we have before this body.

Mr. OWEN. And therefore there is no need for the rule of cloture, because your senate does not violate the courtesy of freedom of debate by a filibuster——

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not know that there has been any prolonged filibuster, but I do know that unlimited debate is allowed under the rules. That is all I know about it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the insertion in the RECORD of the matter referred to by the Senator from Oklahoma? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

PREVIOUS QUESTION IN STATE LEGISLATURES.

ALABAMA.

Senate.

No rule.

House.

20. The previous question shall be in the following form: "Shall the main question be now put?" If demanded by a vote of a majority of the members present, its effect shall be to cut off all debate and bring the house to a direct vote; first, upon the pending amendments, if there are any, in their order, and then on the main question, but the mover of the question or the chairman of the committee having charge of the bill or resolution shall have the right to close the debate after the call of the previous question has been sustained for not more than 15 minutes. (House rules, 1915, p. 8.)

ARIZONA.

Senate.

32. There shall be a motion for the previous question, which being ordered by a majority of senators voting, if a quorum be present, shall have the effect to cut off all debate and bring the senate to a direct vote upon the immediate question or questions on which it has been asked and ordered. The previous question may be asked and ordered upon a single motion, a series of motions allowable under the rules, or an amendment or amendments, or may be made to embrace all authorized motions or amendments and include the bill to its passage or rejection. It shall be in order, pending the motion for, or after the previous question shall have been ordered on its passage, for the president to entertain and submit a motion to commit, with or without instructions, to a standing or select committee. (Senate journal, 1912, p. 75.)

House.

Information not available.

ARKANSAS.

Senate.

19. The previous question shall not be moved by less than three members, and shall be stated in these words, to wit: "Shall the main question be now put?" If the previous question is lost, the main question shall not thereby be postponed, but the senate shall proceed with the consideration of the same. If the previous question is carried, the original mover of the main question, or if the bill or resolution originated in the other house, then the chairman of the committee reporting the same shall have the right to close the debate and be limited to 30 minutes; and should the previous question be ordered on a subject debatable, before the same has been debated, the friends and the opponents of the measure shall have 30 minutes on either side in which to debate the question if desired. (Senate journal, 1901, p. 33.)

House.

53. When any debatable question is before the house any member may move the previous question, but it shall be seconded by at least five members whether that question (called the main question) shall now be put. If it passes in the affirmative, then the main question is to be put immediately, and no member shall debate it further, either to add to or alter: Provided further, When the previous question shall have been adopted the mover of the main question or chairman of the committee shall have the privilege of closing the debate and be limited to one-half hour: Provided further, When the previous question has been ordered on a debatable proposition which has not been debated 15 minutes in the aggregate shall be allowed the friends and opponents of the proposition each before putting the main question. (House journal, 1913, p. 28.)

CALIFORNIA.

Senate.

57. The previous question shall be put in the following form: "Shall the question be now put?" It shall only be admitted when demanded by a majority of the senators present upon a division; and its effect shall be to put an end to all debate, except that the author of the bill or the amendment shall have the right to close, and the subject under discussion shall thereupon be immediately put to a vote. On a motion for the previous question prior to a vote being taken by the senate, a call of the senate shall be in order. (List of members and rules, 1913, p. 59.)

Assembly.

45. The previous question shall be in this form: "Shall the main question be now put?" And its effect, when sustained by a majority of the members present, shall be to put an end to all debate and bring the House to a vote on the question or questions before it. (List of members and rules, 1913, p. 119.)

COLORADO.

Senate.

X, 2. Debate may be closed at any time not less than one hour from the adoption of a motion to that effect, and upon a three-fifths vote of the members elect an hour may be fixed for a vote upon the pending measure. On either of these motions not more than 10 minutes shall be allowed for debate, and no senator shall speak more than 3 minutes; and no other motion shall be entertained until the motion to close debate or to fix an hour for the vote on the pending question shall have been determined. (Senate Journal, 1907, p. 101.)

House.

XXVI, 1. When there shall be a motion for the previous question, which, being ordered by a majority of members present, if a quorum, it shall have the effect to cut off all debate and bring the house to a direct vote upon the immediate question or questions on which it has been asked or ordered. The previous question may be asked and ordered upon a single motion, a series of motions, allowable under the rules, or an amendment or amendments, or may be made to embrace all authorized motions and amendments, and a motion to lay upon the table shall be in order on the second or third reading of the bill.

2. A call of the house shall not be in order after the previous question is ordered unless it shall appear upon the actual count by the speaker that a quorum is not present.

3. All incidental questions of order arising after a motion is made for the previous question, and pending such motion, shall be decided, whether on appeal or otherwise, without debate. (House Journal, 1907, p. 215.)

CONNECTICUT.

Senate.

In the senate of 1911 the previous question was called for, and the point was raised that the previous question does not prevail in the senate; the president pro tempore (Peck) ruled the point well taken. (S. J., 1911, p. 555; register and manual, 1914, p. 133.)

House.

33. When a question is under debate no motion shall be received except—

1. To adjourn.
2. To lay on the table.
3. For the previous question.
4. To postpone indefinitely.
5. To close the debate at a specified time.
6. To postpone to a time certain.
7. To commit or recommit.
8. To amend.
9. To continue to the next general assembly.

Which several motions shall have precedence in the order in which they stand arranged in this rule, and no motion to lay on the table, commit, or recommit, to continue to next general assembly, or to postpone indefinitely, having been once decided, shall be again allowed at the same sitting and at the same stage of the bill or subject matter. (Register and manual, 1914, p. 113.)

DELAWARE.

Senate.

5. All motions shall be subject to debate, except motions to adjourn, to lay on the table, and for the previous question.

25. When a question is under debate no motion shall be received but to adjourn, to lay on the table, for the previous question, to postpone to a certain day, to commit, to amend, and to postpone indefinitely, which several motions shall have precedence in the order in which they are arranged. (Senate rules, 1915, pp. 30, 34.)

House.

35. A motion for the previous question shall not be entertained, except at the request of five members rising for that purpose, and shall be determined without debate; but when the previous question has been called and sustained it shall not cut off any pending amendment. The vote shall be taken, without debate, first on the amendments in their order and then on the main question. (House rules, 1915, pp. 43–44.)

12. He shall put the previous question in the following form: "Shall the main question be now put?" And all debate on the main question and pending amendments shall be suspended, except that the introducer of a bill, resolution, or motion shall, if he so desire, be allowed five minutes to discuss the same, or he may divide his time with or may waive his right in favor of some other one member before the previous question is ordered. After the adoption of the previous question the sense of the house of representatives shall forthwith be taken on pending amendments in their regular order and then put upon the main question.

13. On the previous question there shall be no debate. (House journal, 1911, p. 259.)

GEORGIA.

Senate.

50. The motion for the previous question shall be decided without debate and shall take precedence of all other motions except motions "to adjourn" or "to lay on the table," and when it is moved, the first question shall be, "Shall the call for the previous question be sustained?" If this be decided by a majority vote in the affirmative, the motion "to adjourn" or "to lay on the table" can still be made, but they must be made before the next question, to wit, "Shall the main question be now put?" is decided in the affirmative; and after said last question is affirmatively decided by a majority vote said motions will be out of order, and the Senate can not adjourn until the previous question is exhausted or the regular hour of adjournment arrives.

51. When the previous question has been ordered, the Senate shall then proceed to act on the main question without debate, except that before the main question is put 20 minutes shall be allowed to the committee whose report of the bill or other measure is under consideration to close debate. When the report of the committee is adverse to the passage of the bill or other measure, the introducer of the bill shall be allowed 20 minutes before the time allowed to the committee for closing the debate. The chairman of the committee, or the introducer of the bill or other measure, may yield the floor to such senators as he may indicate for the time, or any part of it, allowed under this rule.

52. After the main question is ordered any senator may call for a division of the senate in taking the vote, or may call for the yeas and nays; but on all questions on which the yeas and nays are called the assent of one-fifth of the number present shall be necessary to sustain the call, and when such call is sustained, the yeas and nays shall be entered on the journal.

53. The effect of the order that the "main question be now put" is to bring the senate to a vote on pending questions in the order in which they stood before it was moved.

54. After the main question has been ordered no motion to reconsider shall be in order until after the vote on the main question is taken and announced.

55. In all cases of contested election, where there is a majority and a minority report from the committee on privileges and elections, if the previous question is ordered, there shall be 20 minutes allowed to the member of said committee whose name is first signed to said minority report, or to such member or members as he may indicate, for the time so allowed, or any part of it, before the 20 minutes allowed to the chairman submitting the majority report.

56. The previous question may be called and ordered upon a single motion or an amendment, or it may be made to embrace all authorized motions or amendments and include the entire bill to its passage or rejection.

57. A call of the senate shall not be in order after the previous question is ordered, unless it shall appear upon an actual count by the president that a quorum is not present.

58. All incidental questions of order arising after a motion is made for the previous question, and pending such motion, shall be decided, whether on appeal or otherwise, without debate. (Legislative Manual, 1900–1901, pp. 30–32.)

House.

64. The motion for the previous question shall be decided without debate, and shall take precedence of all other motions except motions "to adjourn" or "to lay on the table," and when it is moved the question shall be, "Shall the motion for the previous question be sustained?" If this be decided by a majority vote in the affirmative, the motion "to adjourn" or "to lay on the table" can still be made, but they must be made before the next question, to wit, "Shall the main question be now put," is decided in the affirmative, and after said last question is affirmatively decided, by a majority vote, said motion will be out of order, and the house can not adjourn until the previous question is exhausted or the regular hour of adjournment arrives.

65. When the previous question has been ordered the house shall proceed to act on the main question without debate, except that before the main question is put 20 minutes shall be allowed to the committee whose report of the bill or other measure is under consideration to close the debate. Where the report of the committee is adverse to the passage of the bill or other measure the introducer of the bill shall be allowed 20 minutes before the time allowed to the committee for closing the debate. The chairman of the committee or the introducer of the bill or other measure may yield the floor to such members as he may indicate for the time, or any part of it allowed under this rule. This rule shall not be construed to allow the 20 minutes above referred to to be used but once on any bill or measure, and then on the final passage of the bill or measure.

66. After the main question is ordered, any member may call for a division of the house in taking the vote, or may call for the yeas and nays; if the call for the yeas and nays is sustained by one-fifth of the members voting, the vote shall be taken by the yeas and nays and so entered on the Journal.

67. The effect of the order that the "main question be now put," is to bring the house to a vote on pending questions in the order in which they stood before it was moved.

68. After the main question has been ordered, no motion to reconsider shall be in order until after the vote on the main question is taken and announced.

69. In all cases where a minority report has been submitted on any question, if the previous question is ordered, there shall be 20 minutes allowed to the member whose name is first signed to said minority report, or to such member or members as he may indicate, for the time so allowed, or any part of it, before the 20 minutes allowed to the chairman submitting the majority report.

70. The previous question may be called and ordered upon a single motion or an amendment, or it may be made to embrace all authorized motions or amendments and include the entire bill to its passage or rejection.

71. A call of the house shall not be in order after the previous question is ordered, unless it shall appear upon an actual count by the speaker that a quorum is not present.

72. All incidental questions of order arising after a motion is made for the previous question, and pending such motion, shall be decided, whether on appeal or otherwise, without debate. (Legislative Manual 1900–1901, pp. 106–108.)

IV, 2. When a question is under debate the president shall receive no motion but—

To adjourn.
To take a recess.
To proceed to the consideration of the special order.
To lay on the table.
The previous question.
To close debate at a special time.
To postpone to a certain day.
To commit.
To amend or postpone indefinitely.

And they shall take precedence in the order named. (Rules, 1915, pp. 21–22.)

House.

14. Upon the previous question being ordered by a majority of the members present, if a quorum, the effect shall be to cut off debate and bring the house to a direct vote upon the pending question. It shall be in order, pending the motion for or after the previous question shall have been ordered, for the speaker to entertain and submit a motion to commit, with or without instructions, to a standing or select committee, which motion shall be decided without debate.

15. When the previous question is decided in the negative, it shall leave the main question under debate for the residue of the sitting, unless sooner disposed of.

16. All incidental questions of order arising after a motion is made for the previous question, during the pending of such motion or after the house shall have determined that the main question shall be put, shall be decided, whether an appeal or otherwise, without debate. (Rules, 1915, pp. 3–4.)

ILLINOIS.

Senate.

62. The previous question shall be stated in this form: "Shall the main question be now put?" and, until it is decided, shall preclude all amendments or debate. When it is decided that the main question shall now be put, the main question shall be considered as still remaining under debate.

63. The effect of the main question being ordered shall be to put an end to all debate and bring the senate to a direct vote, first upon all amendments reported or pending, in the inverse order in which they are offered. After the motion for the previous question has prevailed, it shall not be in order to move for a call of the senate unless it shall appear by the yeas and nays as taken on the main question that no quorum is present, or to move to adjourn, prior to a decision on the main question. (Senate journal, 1911, p. 13.)

House.

60. The previous question shall be put in this form: "Shall the main question be now put?" and until it is decided shall preclude all amendments or debate. When it is decided that the main question shall not now be put, the main question shall be considered as still remaining under debate.

The effect of the main question being ordered shall be to put an end to all debate and bring the house to a direct vote, first, upon all amendments reported or pending in the inverse order in which they are offered. After the motion for the previous question has prevailed it shall not be in order to move for a call of the house unless it shall appear by yeas and nays, as taken on the main question, that no quorum is present, or to move to adjourn prior to a decision of the main question: Provided, If a motion to postpone is pending the only effect of the previous question shall be to bring the house to a vote upon such motion. (House Journal, 1913, p. 318.)

INDIANA.

Senate.

18. The previous question shall be put in this form: "Shall the main question be now put?" Until it is decided it shall preclude all debate and the introduction of all further amendments. The previous question having been ordered, the main question shall be the first question in order, and its effect shall be to put an end to all debate and bring the senate to a direct vote on the subsidiary questions then pending in their order, and then on the main question. When operating under the previous question there shall be no debate or explanation of votes. (Legislative Manual for 1913, p. 67.)

House.

60. The previous question shall be put in this form: "Shall the main question be now put?" It shall only be admitted when demanded by a majority of the members present, and its effect shall be to put an end to all debate and bring the house to a direct vote upon a motion to commit if such motion shall have been made, and if this motion does not prevail, then upon amendments reported by a committee, if any, then upon pending amendments, and then upon the main question. But its only effect, if a motion to postpone is pending, shall be to bring the house to a vote upon such motion. On the previous question there shall be no debate. All incidental questions of order arising after a motion is made for the previous question, and, pending such motion, shall be decided, whether on appeal or otherwise, without debate. And after a demand for the previous question has been seconded by the house no motion shall be entertained to excuse a member from voting. The ordering of the previous question shall not prevent a member from explaining his vote, but no member under this rule shall be permitted more than one minute for that purpose. (Legislative Manual for 1913, p. 82.)

IOWA.

Senate.

11. A motion to adjourn, to lay on the table, and for the previous question shall be decided without debate, and all incidental questions of order arising after a motion is made for the previous question, and pending such motion, shall be decided—whether an appeal or otherwise—without debate.

12. The previous question shall be in this form: "Shall the main question be now put?" It shall only be admitted when demanded by a majority of the members present, and its effect shall be to put an end to all debate and bring the senate to a direct vote upon pending amendments and then upon the main question, unless otherwise indicated by the motion and ordered by the senate, except that the member in charge of the measure under consideration shall have 10 minutes in which to close the discussion immediately before the vote is taken upon the main question. If the previous question is decided in the negative, the senate shall proceed with the matter before it the same as though the previous question had not been moved. (Official Register, 1911–12, p. 179.)

House.

26. The previous question shall always be put in this form: "Shall the main question be now put?" It shall only be admitted when demanded by a majority of the members present, and its effect shall be to put an end to all debate and to bring the house to a direct vote upon amendments and then upon the main question, unless otherwise indicated by the motion and ordered by the house, except that the member in charge of the measure under consideration shall have 10 minutes in which to close the discussion before the vote is taken. On a motion for the previous question, and prior to seconding the same, a call of the house shall be in order; but after such motion shall have been adopted no call shall be in order prior to the decision of the main question. If the previous question is decided in the negative, the house shall proceed with the matter before it the same as though the previous question had not been moved.

27. Motions to lay on the table, to adjourn, and for the previous question shall be decided without debate. (Official Register, 1911–12, p. 185.)

KANSAS.

Senate.

15. Any five senators shall have the right to demand the previous question. The previous question shall be as follows: "Shall the main question be now put?" and until it is decided shall preclude all amendments or debate. When on taking the previous question the senate shall decide that the main question shall not be put, the main question shall be considered as still remaining under debate. The main question shall be on the passage of the bill, resolution, or other matter under consideration; but when amendments are pending the question shall first be taken upon such amendments in their order; and when amendments have been adopted in committee of the whole and not acted on in the senate, the question shall be taken upon such amendments in like order, and without further debate or amendment. But the previous question can be moved on a pending amendment, and, if adopted, debate is closed on the amendment only; and after the amendment is voted on the main question shall again be open to debate and amendments. In this case the question shall be, "Shall the vote now be taken on the pending amendment?" (Senate rules, 1913, 1st ed., p. 5.)

House.

51. The "previous question" shall be as follows: "Shall the main question be now put?" and until it is decided shall preclude all amendment or debate. When, on taking the previous question, the house shall decide that the main question shall not now be put, the main question shall be considered as still remaining under debate. The main question shall be on the passage of the bill, resolution, or other matter under consideration; but when amendments are pending, the question shall first be taken upon such amendments in their order; and when amendments have been adopted by the committee of the whole and not acted on in the house, the question shall be taken upon such amendments in like order, and without further debate or amendment. (House Rules, 1913, p. 16.)

KENTUCKY.

Senate.

55. When the "previous question" has been moved, seconded, and adopted a vote shall be immediately taken upon the pending measure and such pending amendments as are in order.

The effect of the "previous question" shall therefore be to put an end to all debate; to prevent the offering of additional amendments, and to bring the senate to an immediate vote upon the measure as aforesaid.

The previous question may be ordered by a majority of the senators voting on that question. On the call of the roll no senator shall be allowed to speak more than three minutes to explain his vote and shall not speak at all if the question is not a debatable question. After the previous question has been ordered a senator, whose bill or amendment or motion—if debatable—is pending, may speak not exceeding 10 minutes thereon, and one senator of the opposition may speak not exceeding 10 minutes. (Directory, 1914, p. 244.)

House.

24. The previous question being moved and seconded, the question from the Chair shall be, "Shall the main question be now put?" And if the nays prevail, the main question shall not then be put. The effect of the previous question shall be to put an end to all debate except on the final passage of the measure under consideration; then the opponents of the measure shall have 10 minutes to debate the proposition and the proposer of the measure shall be limited to 10 minutes to close the debate, unless his time be extended by consent of the house, and bring the house to a direct vote on amendments proposed by a committee, if any; then on pending amendments and all amendments which have been read for information of the house by the clerk shall be regarded as pending amendments; and then upon the main question. 31. When motion for the previous question is made the consent of one-third of the members present shall be necessary to authorize the speaker to entertain it. No debate shall be allowed until the matter of consent is determined. The previous question shall be submitted in the following words: "Shall the main question be put now?" No member shall speak more than five minutes on the motion for the previous question, and while that question is pending a motion to lay on the table shall not be decided without debate. A call for the yeas and nays or for division of a question shall be in order after the main question has been ordered to be put. After the adoption of the previous question the vote shall be taken forthwith upon amendments, and then upon the main question. (Maine Register, 1914–15, pp. 186–187.)

19. There shall be a motion for the previous question, which, being ordered by a majority of the members present, shall preclude all further debate and bring the house to a direct vote upon the immediate question or questions on which it has been asked and ordered. It may be asked and ordered upon any debatable motion or a series of motions to and embracing the main question, if desired. (Maryland Manual, 1912, p. 287.)

MASSACHUSETTS.

Senate.

47. Debate may be closed at any time not less than one hour from the adoption of a motion to that effect. On this motion not more than 10 minutes shall be allowed for debate, and no member shall speak more than 3 minutes. (Manual for the General Court, 1913, p. 533.)

House.

81. The previous question shall be put in the following form: "Shall the main question be now put?" and all debate upon the main question shall be suspended until the previous question is decided.

82. On the previous question debate shall be allowed only to give reasons why the main question should not be put.

83. All questions of order arising after a motion is made for the previous question shall be decided without debate, excepting on appeal; and on such appeal no member shall speak more than once, without leave of the house.

84. The adoption of the previous question shall put an end to all debate, except as provided in rule 86, and bring the house to a direct vote upon pending amendments, if any, in their regular order, and then upon the main question.

85. Debate may be closed at any time not less than 30 minutes from the adoption of a motion to that effect. In case the time is extended by unanimous consent, the same rule shall apply at the end of the extended time as at the time originally fixed.

86. When debate is closed by ordering the previous question or by a vote to close debate at a specified time, the member in charge of the measure under consideration shall be allowed to speak 10 minutes and may grant to any other member any portion of his time. When the measure under consideration has been referred to the committee on ways and means, under house rule 44, the member originally reporting it shall be considered in charge, except where the report of the committee on ways and means is substantially different from that referred to them, in which case the member originally reporting the measure and the member of the committee on ways and means reporting thereon shall each be allowed to speak five minutes, the latter to have the close. When the member entitled to speak under this rule is absent, the member standing first in order upon the committee reporting the measure who is present and joined in the report shall have the right to occupy such time. (Manual for the General Court, 1913, pp. 566–568.)

MICHIGAN.

Senate.

41. The mode of ordering the previous question shall be as follows: Any senator may move the previous question. This being seconded by at least one other Senator, the chair shall submit the question in this form, "Shall the main question now be put?" This shall be ordered only by a majority of the senators present and voting. The effect of ordering the previous question shall be to instantly close debate and bring the senate to an immediate vote on the pending question or questions in their regular order. The motion for the previous question may be limited by the mover to one or more of the questions preceding the main question itself, in which case the form shall be, "Shall the question, as limited, be now put?" The yeas and nays may be demanded on any vote under this rule, and a motion for a call of the senate shall be in order at any time prior to the ordering of the previous question. Any question of order or appeal from the decision of the chair, pending the previous question, shall be decided without debate. When the question is on motion to reconsider, under the operation of the previous question and it is decided in the affirmative, the previous question shall have no operation upon the question to be reconsidered. If the senate refuses to order the previous question, the consideration of the subject shall be resumed, as if no motion therefor had been made. (Michigan Manual, 1913, p. 586.)

House.

51. The method of ordering the previous question shall be as follows: Any member may move the previous question. This being seconded by at least 10 members, the chair shall put the question, "Shall the main question now be put?" This shall be ordered only by a majority of the members present and voting. After the seconding of the previous question, and prior to ordering the same, a call of the house may be moved and ordered, but after ordering the previous question nothing shall be in order prior to the decision of the pending questions, except demands for yeas and nays, points of order, and appeals from the decision of the chair, which shall be decided without debate. The effect of the previous question shall be to put an end to all debate and bring the house to a direct vote upon all pending questions in their order down to and including the main question. When a motion to reconsider is taken under the previous question, and is decided in the affirmative, the previous question shall have no operation upon the question to be reconsidered. If the house shall refuse to order the main question, the consideration of the subject shall be resumed, as though no motion for the previous question had been made. (Michigan Manual, 1913, p. 594–595.)

MINNESOTA.

Senate.

25. The previous question shall be in this form: "Shall the main question be now put?" It shall only be admitted when demanded by a majority of the members present, and its effect shall be to put an end to all debate, and bring the senate to a direct vote upon amendments reported by a committee, if any, then upon all pending amendments in their order, and then upon the main question. On a motion for the previous question, and prior to the ordering of the same, a call of the senate shall be in order, but after a majority shall have ordered such motion, no call shall be in order prior to the decision of the main question.

26. On a previous question there shall be no debate. All incidental questions of order arising after a motion is made for the previous question, and pending such motion, shall be decided, whether on appeal or otherwise, without debate. (Legislative Manual, Minnesota, 1913, p. 156.)

House.

30. (a) The previous question shall be in this form: "The gentleman from ——— moves the previous question. Do 10 members second the motion?" If the motion be properly seconded, the question shall be stated, as follows: "As many as are in favor of ordering the previous question will say 'aye'; as many as are opposed will say 'no.'"

There shall be a motion for the previous question which, being ordered by a majority of all members present, shall have the effect to cut off all debate and bring the house to a direct vote upon the immediate question or questions upon which it has been asked or ordered.

The previous question may be asked and ordered upon a single motion, a series of motions allowable under the rules, or an amendment or amendments; or it may be made to embrace all authorized motions or amendments and include the bill to its passage or rejection.

(b) A call of the house shall not be in order after the previous question is ordered unless it shall appear that a quorum is not present.

(c) When the previous question is decided in the negative, it shall leave the main question under debate for the residue of the sitting unless sooner disposed of by taking a vote on the question or in some other manner. (Legislative Manual, Minnesota, 1913, p. 169.)

47. The previous question shall be in this form: "Shall the main question be now put?" It shall only be admitted on demand of two senators and sustained by a vote of a majority of the senators present, and its effect shall put an end to all debate and bring the senate to a direct vote upon a motion to commit if such motion shall have been made; and if this motion does not prevail, then upon amendments reported by a committee, if any, then upon pending amendments, and then upon the main question. On demand of the previous question, a call of the senate shall be in order, but after a majority have sustained such a motion no call shall be in order prior to the decision on the main question.

48. On motion for the previous question no debate shall be allowed, and all incidental questions of order arising after the motion is made for the previous question, and, pending such motion, shall be decided, on appeal or otherwise, without debate. If, on a vote for the previous question, a majority of the senators vote in the negative, then the further consideration of the subject matter shall be in order. (Senate Journal, 1911, p. 37.)

House.

57. The previous question shall be in this form: "Shall the question now under immediate consideration be now put?" It may be moved and seconded like any other question, but it shall only prevail when supported by a majority of the members present, and, until decided, shall preclude amendment and debate; and a failure to sustain the same shall not put the matter under consideration from before the house, but the house shall proceed as if said motion had not been made. (House Journal, 1911, p. 21.)

MONTANA.

Senate.

30. The previous question shall be in this form: "Shall the main question be now put." It shall only be admitted when demanded by a majority of the senators present, upon division, and its effect shall be to put an end to all debate and bring the senate to a direct vote upon amendments reported by a committee, if any, upon pending amendments, and then upon the main question. On a motion for the previous question, and prior to the seconding of the same, a call of the senate shall be in order, but after a majority of the senators have seconded such motion no call shall be in order prior to the decision of the main question. If the previous question is negatived, the senate shall proceed in the same manner as if the motion had not been made.

31. On a motion for the previous question and under the previous question there shall be no debate; and all incidental questions of order arising after a motion is made for the previous question (or while acting under the previous question) shall be decided, whether on appeal or otherwise, without debate. (Legislative Manual, 1895, pp. 23–24.)

House.

XXIII. 1. There shall be a motion for the previous question, which, being ordered by a majority, if a quorum be present, shall have the effect to cut off all debate and bring the house to a direct vote upon the immediate question or questions on which it has been asked or ordered: Provided, That when the previous question is ordered on any proposition on which there has been no debate it shall be in order to debate the proposition to be voted on for 30 minutes, one-half of such time to be given to debate in favor of and one-half in debate in opposition to such proposition. The previous question may be asked and ordered upon a single motion, a series of motions allowable under the rules, or an amendment or amendments, and include the bill to its passage or rejection. It shall be in order, pending the motion for or after the previous question shall have been ordered on its passage, for the speaker to entertain and submit motion to commit, with or without instructions, to a standing or select committee; and a motion to lay upon the table shall be in order on the second and third reading of a bill.

2. A call of the house shall not be in order after the previous question is ordered unless it shall appear upon an actual count by the speaker that a quorum is not present.

3. All incidental questions of order arising from, after a motion is made for the previous question, and pending such motion shall be decided, whether on appeal or otherwise, without debate. (Legislative Manual, 1895, pp. 34–35.)

33. The previous question shall be put in this form: "Shall the main question be now put?" It shall only be admitted when demanded by a majority of the members present, and its effect shall be, if decided affirmatively, to put an end to all debate, and bring the house to a direct vote upon amendments reported by a committee, if any, then upon pending amendments, and then upon the main question; if decided in the negative, to leave the main question and amendments, if any, under debate for the residue of the sitting, unless sooner disposed of by taking the question, or in some other manner. All incidental questions of order arising after a motion is made for the previous question, and pending such motion, shall be decided, whether on appeal or otherwise, without debate. (Legislative Manual, 1914, p. 84.)

Information not available, except that before inauguration of statehood previous question in both houses was allowed. (Council Rules, 1907, p. 8; House Rules, 1901, p. 11.)

NEW YORK.

Senate.

32. When any bill, resolution, or motion shall have been under consideration for six hours it shall be in order for any senator to move to close debate, and the president shall recognize the senator who wishes to make such motion. Such motion shall not be amendable or debatable and shall be immediately put, and if it shall receive the affirmative votes of a majority of the senators present, the pending measure shall take precedence over all other business. The vote shall thereupon be taken upon such bill, motion, or resolution, with such amendments as may be pending at the time of such motion according to the rules of the senate, but without further debate, except that any senator who may desire so to do shall be permitted to speak thereon not more than once and not exceeding one-half hour. After such motion to close debate has been made by any senator, no other motion shall be in order until such motion has been voted upon by the senate. After the senate shall have adopted the motion to close debate, as hereinbefore provided, no motion shall be in order but one motion to adjourn and a motion to commit. Should said motion to adjourn be carried, the measure under consideration shall be the pending question when the senate shall again convene and shall be taken up at the time of such adjournment. The motion to close debate may be ordered upon a single motion, a series of motions allowable under the rules, or an amendment or amendments, or may be made to embrace all authorized motions or amendments and include the bill, resolution, or motion to its passage or rejection. All incidental questions of order, or motions pending at the time such motion is made to close debate, whether the same be on appeal or otherwise, shall be decided without debate. (Red Book, 1914, pp. 627–628.)

House.

29. The "previous question" shall be put as follows: "Shall the main question now be put?" and until it is decided, shall preclude all amendments or debate. When on taking the previous question the house shall decide that the main question shall not now be put, the main question shall be considered as still remaining under debate. The "main question" shall be the advancement or passage of the bill, resolution, or other matter under consideration; but when amendments are pending, the question shall first be taken upon such amendments in their order. (Red Book, 1914, p. 659.)

NORTH CAROLINA.

Senate.

24. The previous question shall be as follows: "Shall the main question be put?" and, until it is decided, shall preclude all amendments and debate. If this question shall be decided in the affirmative, the "main question" shall be on the passage of the bill, resolution, or other matter under consideration; but when amendments are pending the question shall be taken upon such amendments, in their order, without further debate or amendment. However, any senator may move the previous question and may restrict the same to an amendment or other matter then under discussion. If such question be decided in the negative, the main question shall be considered as remaining under debate.

25. When the motion for the previous question is made, and pending the second thereto by a majority, debate shall cease, and only a motion to adjourn or lay on the table shall be in order, which motions shall be put as follows: Previous question; adjourn; lay on the table. After a motion for the previous question is made, pending a second thereto, any member may give notice that he desires to offer an amendment to the bill or other matter under consideration, and after the previous question is seconded, such member shall be entitled to offer his amendment in pursuance of such notice. (Manual, 1913, p. 21.)

House.

56. The previous question shall be as follows: "Shall the main question be now put?" and, until it is decided, shall preclude all amendments and debate. If this question shall be decided in the affirmative, the "main question" shall be on the passage of the bill, resolution, or other matter under consideration, but when amendments are pending, the question shall be taken upon such amendments, in their order, without further debate or amendment. If such question be decided in the negative, the main question shall be considered as remaining under debate: Provided, That no one shall move the previous question except the member submitting the report on the bill or other matter under consideration, and the member introducing the bill or other matter under consideration, or the member in charge of the measure, who shall be designated by the chairman of the committee reporting the same to the house at the time the bill or other matter under consideration is reported to the house or taken up for consideration.

When a motion for the previous question is made, and pending the second thereto by a majority, debate shall cease; but if any member obtains the floor he may move to lay the matter under consideration on the table, or move an adjournment, and when both or either of these motions are pending the question shall stand:

(1) Previous question.
(2) To adjourn.
(3) To lay on the table.

And then upon the main question, or amendments, or the motion to postpone indefinitely, postpone to a day certain, to commit, or amend, in the order of their precedence, until the main question is reached or disposed of; but after the previous question has been called by a majority no motion, amendment, or debate shall be in order.

All motions below the motion to lay on the table must be made prior to a motion for the previous question; but, pending and not after the second therefor, by the majority of the house, a motion to adjourn or lay on the table, or both, are in order. This constitutes the precedence of the motion to adjourn and lay on the table over other motions in rule 25.

Motions stand as follows in order of precedence in rule 26: Lay on the table, previous question, postpone indefinitely, postpone definitely, to commit or amend.

When the previous question is called all motions below it fall, unless made prior to the call, and all motions above it after its second by a majority required. Pending the second, the motions to adjourn and lay on the table are in order, but not after a second. When in order and every motion is before the house, the question stands as follows: Previous question, adjourn, lay on the table, postpone indefinitely, postpone definitely, to commit, amendment to amendment, amendment, substitute, bill.

The previous question covers all other motions when seconded by a majority of the house, and proceeds by regular gradation to the main question, without debate, amendment, or motion, until such question is reached or disposed of. (House Rules, 1915, pp. 8–10.)

NORTH DAKOTA.

Senate.

8. When a question is under debate no motion shall be received except to adjourn, to lay on the table, to move for the previous question, to move to postpone to a day certain, to commit or amend, to postpone indefinitely, which several motions shall have precedence in the order in which they are named, and no motion to postpone to a day certain, to commit, to postpone indefinitely, having been decided, shall be entertained on the same day and at the same stage of the bill or proposition. (Senate Rules, 1915, p. 11.)

House.

14. The previous question shall be in this form: "Shall the main question be now put?" It shall be admitted only when demanded by a majority of the members present, and its effect shall be to put an end to all debate and bring the house to a direct vote upon the amendments reported by a committee, if any, upon the pending amendments and then upon the main question. On a motion for the previous question, and prior to the seconding of the same, a call of the house shall be in order, but after a majority shall have seconded such motion no call shall be in order prior to decision of the main question.

15. When the previous question is decided in the negative it shall leave the main question under debate for the remainder of the sitting unless sooner disposed of in some other manner.

16. All incidental questions of order arising after motion is made for the previous question, during the pendency of such motion, or after the house shall have determined that the main question shall be now put shall be decided, whether on appeal or otherwise, without debate. (House Rules, 1915, pp. 13–14.)

OHIO.

Senate.

105. A motion for the previous question shall be entertained only upon the demand of three senators. The president shall put the question in this form: "The question is, Shall the debate now close?" and until decided it shall preclude further debate and all amendments and motions, except one motion to adjourn, one motion to take a recess, one motion to lay on the table, and one call of the senate.

106. All incidental questions or questions of order arising after the demand for the previous question is made shall be decided without debate and shall not be subject to appeal.

107. After the demand for the previous question has been sustained no call or motion shall be in order, but the senate shall be brought to an immediate vote, first upon the main question.

108. Agreement to a motion to reconsider a vote on a "main question" shall not revive the "previous question," but the matter shall be subject to amendment and debate. (Legislative Manual, 1912, pp. 22–23.)

House.

52. The previous question shall be in this form: "Shall the debate now close?" It shall be permitted when demanded by five or more members, and must be sustained by a majority vote, and, until decided, shall preclude further debate, and all amendments and motions, except one motion to adjourn, and one motion to lay on table.

53. All incidental questions or questions of order arising after a motion is made for the previous question, and pending such motion, shall be decided without debate and shall not be subject to appeal.

54. On a motion for the previous question, and prior to voting on the same, a call of the house shall be in order; but after the demand for the previous question shall have been sustained no call shall be in order; and the house shall be brought to an immediate vote, first upon the pending amendments in the inverse order of their age, and then upon the main question.

55. If a motion for the previous question be not sustained, the subject under consideration shall be proceeded with the same as if the motion had not been made. (Legislative Manual, 1912, pp. 69–70.)

OKLAHOMA.

Senate.

33 (a) There shall be a motion for the previous question, which shall be stated in these words, to wit, "Shall the main question be now put?" which, being ordered by a majority of the members voting, if a quorum be present, shall have the effect to cut off all debate and bring the house to a direct vote upon the immediate question or questions on which it has been asked and ordered. The previous question may be asked and ordered upon a single motion, a series of motions allowable under the rules, or an amendment or amendments, and include the bill to its passage or rejection. It shall be in order, pending the motion for or after the previous question, for the president to entertain and submit a motion to commit with or without instructions to a standing or select committee. (Jefferson's Manual, sec. 34.)

(b) If the previous question is carried, the original mover of the main question, or, if the bill or resolution originated in the other house, then the chairman of the committee reporting the same, shall have the right to close the debate and be limited to 15 minutes, and should the previous question be ordered on a subject debatable before the same has been debated the friends and opponents of the measure shall have 30 minutes on either side in which to debate the question if desired. (Jefferson's Manual, sec. 34; Red Book, 1912, v. 2, p. 109.)

House.

44. When any debatable question is before the house any member may move the previous question, but before it is put it shall be seconded by at least five members whether that question (called the main question) shall now be put. If it passes in the affirmative, then the main question is to be put immediately, and no member shall debate it further, either add to it or alter: Provided, That after the previous question shall have been adopted the mover of the main question or the chairman of the committee shall have the privilege of closing the debate and be limited to one-fourth hour: Provided further, That when the previous question has been ordered on a debatable proposition which has not been debated 15 minutes in the aggregate shall be allowed the friends and opponents of the proposition each before putting the main question. (Red Book, 1912, v. 2, p. 96.)

OREGON.

Senate.

37. The previous question shall be put in the following form: "Shall the main question now be put?" It shall only be admitted when demanded by a majority of the senators present, and its effect shall be to put an end to all debate, except that the author of the bill or other matter before the senate, shall have the right to close, and the subject under discussion shall thereupon be immediately put to a vote. On a motion for the previous question, prior to a vote of the senate being taken, a call of the senate shall be in order. (Senate Journal, 1911, p. 359.)

House.

30. The previous question shall be put in this form: "Shall the main question be now put?" It shall only be admitted when demanded by a majority of the members present, and, until it is decided, shall preclude all amendment and further debate on the main question except by the mover of the original motion, who shall be allowed 10 minutes. On a motion for the previous question, a roll call shall be in order if demanded by two members.

31. On a previous question there shall be no debate; all incidental questions of order arising after a motion is made for the previous question, and pending such motion, shall be decided, whether an appeal or otherwise, without debate. (House rules, 1909, p. 7.)

PENNSYLVANIA.

Senate.

9. The motion for the previous question, for postponement, for commitment, and for amendment, shall take precedence in the order mentioned, and a motion for the previous question shall preclude any of the other motions from being made; a motion to postpone shall preclude a motion to commit; or to amend a motion to commit shall preclude a motion to amend. The motion for the previous question, postponement (other than indefinite postponement), or commitment shall preclude debate on the original subject. The previous question shall not be moved by less than four members.

10. When a call for the previous question has been made and sustained, the question shall be upon pending amendments and the main question in their regular order, and all incidental questions of order arising after a motion for the previous question has been made, and pending such motion shall be decided, whether on appeal or otherwise, without debate. (Smull's Legislative Handbook, 1914, p. 1006.)

House.

21. The previous question shall not be moved by less than 20 members rising for that purpose, and shall be determined without debate; but when the previous question has been called and sustained it shall not cut off any pending amendment, but the vote shall be taken without debate, on the amendments in their order and then on the main question. (Smull's Legislative Handbook, 1914, p. 1031.)

RHODE ISLAND.

Senate.

20. There shall be a motion for the previous question, which shall not be debatable, and which may be asked and ordered upon any bill or section thereof, amendment, motion, resolution, or question which is debatable, any of which shall be considered as the main question for the purpose of applying the previous question. All incidental questions of order arising after a motion for the previous question has been made, and before the vote has been taken on the main question, shall be decided, whether on appeal or otherwise, without debate.

When the previous question has been ordered a motion to reconsider such vote shall not be in order, and no motion to adjourn while a quorum is present shall be entertained between the taking of such vote and the taking of the vote on the main question, but 10 minutes shall be allowed for further debate upon the main question, during which no member shall speak more than 3 minutes, and a further period of 10 minutes, if desired, shall be allowed for debate to the member introducing the bill or question to be acted upon, or to the member or members to whom he may yield the floor, at the close of which time, or at the close of the first 10 minutes, in case the introducer does not desire to so use his time, the vote on the main question shall be taken. If incidental questions of order are raised after the previous question has been ordered, the time occupied in deciding such questions shall be deducted from the time allowed for debate. (Manual, 1914, p. 359.)

House.

29. There shall be a motion for the previous question, which shall not be debatable, and which may be moved, and ordered upon any bill or section thereof, amendment, motion, resolution, or question which is debatable, any of which shall be considered as the main question for the purpose of applying the previous question. When a motion for the previous question has been made, no other motion shall be entertained by the speaker until it has been put to the house and decided. All incidental questions of order arising after a motion for the previous question has been made, and before the vote has been taken on the main question, shall be decided, whether on appeal or otherwise, without debate. When the previous question has been ordered a motion to reconsider such vote shall not be in order, and no motion to adjourn or to take a recess while a quorum is present shall be entertained between the taking of such vote and the taking of the vote on the main question, but 10 minutes shall be allowed for further debate upon the main question, during which no member shall speak more than 3 minutes, and a further period of 10 minutes, if desired, shall be allowed for debate to the member introducing the bill or question to be acted upon, or to the member or members to whom he may yield the floor, at the close of which time, or at the close of the first 10 minutes, in case the introducer does not desire to so use his time, the vote on the main question shall be taken. If incidental questions of order are raised after the previous question has been ordered, the time occupied in deciding such questions shall be deducted from the time allowed for debate. (Manual, 1914, p. 367.)

SOUTH DAKOTA.

Senate.

62. The previous question shall be stated in this form: "Shall the main question be now put?" and until it is decided shall preclude all amendments or debate. When it is decided the main question shall not be now put, the main question shall be considered as still remaining under debate.

63. The effect of the main question being ordered shall be to put an end to all debate and bring the senate to a direct vote, first, upon all amendments reported or pending in the inverse order in which they are offered. After a motion for the previous question has prevailed, it shall not be in order to move a call of the senate or to move to adjourn, prior to a decision of the main question.

64. The senate may at any time, by a majority vote, close all debate upon a pending amendment, or an amendment thereto, and cause the question to be put thereon, and this does not preclude further amendments or debate on the main subject. (Manual 1913, p. 565–566.)

House.

15. On a motion for the previous question and prior to voting on the same, a call of the house shall be in order, but after the demand for the previous question shall have been sustained, no call shall be in order, and the house shall be brought to an immediate vote—first, upon the pending amendments in the inverse order of their age, and then upon the main question. The previous question may be ordered upon all recognized motions or amendments which are debatable, and shall have the effect to cut off all debate and bring the assembly to a direct vote upon the motion or amendment on which it has been ordered.

16. When the previous question is decided in the negative it shall leave the main question under debate for the residue of the sitting, unless sooner disposed of by taking the question, or in some other manner.

17. All incidental questions of order arising after motion is made for the previous question, during the pending of such motions or after the house shall have determined that the main question shall now be put, shall be decided, whether on appeal or otherwise, without debate. (Manual 1913, p. 569.)

TENNESSEE.

Senate.

22. The previous question shall be in this form: "Shall the main question be now put?" It shall be admitted only when demanded by a majority of the members present. If the previous question is sustained, its effect shall be to preclude all future amendments, and terminate all debate, and bring the senate to a direct vote upon the subject or matter to which it was applied in the call. (Manual 1890, p. 157.)

House.

55. The previous question shall be in this form: "Shall the main question be now put?" It shall only be admitted when demanded by two-thirds of the members present. And if the call is made and sustained, its effect shall be to preclude all future amendments and terminate all debate; but it may be applied to the main question, or to the main question and amendment, or the main question, amendment, and amendment to the amendment, and shall bring the house to a direct vote on the question in the order in which they stand and from the point where the call was applied. But in all debates upon resolutions or bills immediately prior to their final passage on third reading the mover or author of the resolution or bill shall have the right to close the debate thereon, and no call for the previous question, nor any other motion, shall cut off this right in the mover or author of the measure. (Manual, 1890, p. 154.)

TEXAS.

Senate.

90. Pending the consideration of any question before the senate, any senator may call for the previous question, and if seconded by five senators the presiding officer shall submit the question, "Shall the main question now be put?" And if a majority vote is in favor of it, the main question shall be ordered, the effect of which shall be to cut off all further amendments and debate and bring the senate to a direct vote—first, upon pending amendments and motions, if there be any; then upon the main proposition. The previous question may be ordered on any pending amendment or motion before the senate as a separate proposition and be decided by a vote upon said amendment or motion. (Senate Journal, 1911, p. 172.)

House.

XIII.

1. There shall be a motion for the previous question, which shall be admitted only when seconded by twenty-five (25) members. It shall be put by the chair in this manner: "The motion has been seconded. As many as are in favor of ordering the previous question on (here state on what question or questions) will say 'aye,'" and then, "As many as are opposed say 'no.'" If ordered by a majority of the members voting, a quorum being present, it shall have the effect of cutting off all debate and bringing the house to a direct vote upon the immediate question or questions upon which it has been asked and ordered.

2. The previous question may be asked and ordered upon any debatable single motion or series of motions allowable under the rules, or an amendment or amendments, or may be made to embrace all authorized debatable motions or amendments, and include the bill or resolution to its passage or rejection. It may be applied to motions to postpone to a day certain, or indefinitely, or to commit, and can not be laid upon the table.

3. On the motion for the previous question there shall be no debate, and all incidental questions of order after it is made, and pending such motion, shall be decided, whether on appeal or otherwise, without debate.

4. After the previous question has been ordered there shall be no debate upon the questions on which it has been ordered, or upon incidental questions, except only that the mover of the proposition or the member making the report from the committee, as the case may be, or, in case of the absence of either of them, any other member designated by such absentee, shall have the right to close the debate, after which a vote shall be immediately taken on the amendments, if any there were, and then on the main question.

5. When the previous question is ordered upon a motion to postpone indefinitely or to amend by striking out the enacting clause of a bill the mover of a proposition or bill proposed to be so postponed or amended, or the member reporting the same from a committee, shall have the right to close the debate on the original proposition, after which the member moving to postpone or amend shall be allowed to close the debate on his motion or amendment.

6. No motion for an adjournment or recess shall be in order after the previous question is seconded until the final vote upon the main question shall be taken, unless the roll call shows the absence of a quorum.

7. A call of the house may be moved after the previous question has been ordered. (House Journal, 1913, p. 70.)

30. The previous question shall be in this form: "Shall the question be now put?" And its effect, when sustained by a majority of the members present, shall be to put an end to all debate, except as to the mover of the matter pending or the chairman of the committee who reported it, who shall be privileged to close the debate and bring the house to a vote on the question or questions before it: Provided, That when a motion to amend or to commit is pending its effect shall be to cut off debate and bring the house to a vote on the motion to amend or commit only and not upon the question to be amended or committed. All incidental questions arising after motion is made for the previous question shall be decided, whether on appeal or otherwise, without debate. The previous question shall be put only when demanded by two members. (House Journal, 1913, p. —.)

VERMONT.

Senate.

26. A call for the previous question shall not at any time be in order. A motion to adjourn shall always be in order, except when the senate is engaged in voting. (Senate Rules, 1915, p. 17.)

House.

38. At any time in the course of debate on a debatable question a member may move "that debate upon the pending question do now close," and the speaker shall put the question to the house without debate, and if the motion is decided in the affirmative debate shall be closed on the immediate pending question. Or a member may move "that debate on the whole question do now close," and if the motion be decided in the affirmative debate shall be closed on the whole question and the main question shall be put in its order, and no motion, except a motion to substitute either of said motions for the other, shall be in order until the main question is put and decided. (House Rules, 1915, p. 40.)

VIRGINIA.

Senate.

49. Upon a motion for the pending question, seconded by a majority of the senators present, indicated by a rising or by a recorded vote, the president shall immediately put the pending question, and all incidental questions of order arising after a motion for the pending question is made, and, pending such motion, shall be decided, whether on appeal or otherwise, without debate.

50. Upon a motion for the previous question seconded by a majority of the senators present, indicated by a rising or by a recorded vote, the president shall immediately put the question; first, upon amendments in the order prescribed in the rules, and then upon the main question. If the previous question be not ordered, debate may continue as if the motion had not been made. (Rules, 1914, pp. 16–17.)

House.

65. Pending a debate any member who obtains the floor for that purpose only and submits no other motion or remark may move for the "previous question" or the "pending question," and in either case the motion shall be forthwith put to the house. Two-thirds of the members present shall be required to order the main question, but a majority may require an immediate vote upon the pending question, whatever it may be.

66. The previous question shall be in this form: "Shall the main question now be put?" If carried, its effect shall be to put an end to all debate and bring the house to a direct vote upon a motion to commit if pending, then upon amendments reported by a committee if any, then upon pending amendments, and then upon the main question. If upon the motion for the previous question the main question be not ordered, debate may continue as if the motion had not been made. (Rules, 1914, pp. 39–40.)

WASHINGTON.

Senate.

39. The previous question shall not be put unless demanded by three senators whose names shall be entered upon the journal, and it shall then be in this form: "Shall the main question be now put?" When sustained by a majority of senators present it shall preclude all debate, and the roll shall be immediately called on the question or questions before the senate, and all incidental question or questions of order arising after the motion is made after the previous question and pending such motion shall be decided whether on appeal or otherwise without debate. (Legislative Manual, 1911, pp. 36–37.)

House.

27. The previous question may be ordered by two-thirds of the members present upon all recognized motions or amendments which are debatable, and shall have the effect to cut off all debate and bring the house to a direct vote upon the motion or amendment on which it has been ordered. On motion for the previous question and prior to the seconding of the same a call of the house shall be in order, but such call shall not be in order thereafter prior to the decision of the main question.

The question is not debatable and can not be amended. The previous question shall be put in this form: "Mr. ——— demands the previous question. As many as are in favor of ordering the previous question will say 'aye'; as many as are opposed will say 'no.'"

The results of the motion are as follows:

If determined in the negative, the consideration goes on as if the motion had never been made; if decided in the affirmative, the presiding officer at once, and without debate, proceeds to put, first, the amendments pending and then the main question as amended. If an adjournment is had after the previous question is ordered, the subject comes up the first thing after the reading of the journal the next day, and the previous question privileged over all other business, whether new or unfinished. (Legislative Manual, 1911, p. 51.)

WEST VIRGINIA.

Senate.

56. There shall be a motion for the previous question, which, being ordered by a majority of members present, if a quorum, shall have the effect to cut off all debate and bring the senate to direct vote upon the immediate question or questions on which it has been asked and ordered. The previous question may be asked and ordered upon a single motion, a series of motions, or may be made to embrace all authorized motions and amendments and include the bill to its engrossment and third reading, and then, on renewal and second of said motion, to its passage or rejection. It shall be in order, pending a motion for or after the previous question shall have been ordered on its passage, for the president to entertain and submit a motion to commit, with or without instruction, to a standing or select committee; and a motion to lay upon the table shall be in order on the second and third reading of a bill.

(2) A call of the senate shall not be in order after the previous question is in order unless it shall appear upon an actual count by the president that a quorum is not present.

(3) All incidental questions of order arising after a motion is made for the previous question, and, pending such motion, shall be decided, whether an appeal or otherwise, without debate. (Legislative Manual, 1913, p. 44–45.)

House.

78. If the previous question be demanded by not less than seven members, the speaker shall, without debate, put the question, "Shall the main question be now put?" If this question be decided in the affirmative, all further debate shall cease and the vote be at once taken on the proposition pending before the house. When the house refuses to order the main question, the consideration of the subject shall be resumed as if the previous question had not been demanded.

79. The previous question shall not be admitted in the committee of the whole. (Legislative Manual, 1913, p. 70.)

WISCONSIN.

Senate and house.

80. Moving previous question. When any bill, memorial, or resolution is under consideration, any member being in order and having the floor may move the "previous question," but such motion must be seconded by at least 5 senators or 15 members of the assembly.

81. Putting of motion; ending debate. The previous question being moved, the presiding officer shall say, "It requiring 5 senators or 15 members of the assembly, as the case may be, to second the motion for the previous question, those in favor of sustaining the motion will rise." And if a sufficient number rise, the previous question shall be thereby seconded, and the question shall then be: "Shall the main question be now put?" which question shall be determined by the yeas and nays. The main question being ordered to be now put, its effects shall be to put an end to all debate and bring the house to a direct vote upon the pending amendments, if there be any, and then upon the main question.

82. Main question may remain before house, when. On taking the previous question, the house shall decide that the main question shall not now be put, the main question shall remain as the question before the house, in the same stage of proceedings as before the previous question was moved.

83. One call of house in order, when. On motion for the previous question, and prior to the ordering of the main question, one call of the house shall be in order; but after proceedings under such call shall have been once dispensed with, or after a majority shall have ordered the main question, no call shall be in order prior to the decision of such question. (Manual, 1911, pp. 97–98.)

WYOMING.

Senate.

43. Any member may move the previous question, and if it be seconded by three other members, the previous question shall be put in this form: "Shall the main question be now put?" The object of this motion is to bring the senate to a vote on the pending question without further discussion; and if the motion fails, the discussion may proceed the same as if the motion had not been made; if carried, all debate shall cease, and the president shall immediately put the main question to vote: First on proposed amendments in their order, and then on the main question, without debate on further amendment: Provided, That a motion to adjourn and a call of the senate shall each be in order after the previous question has been sustained and before the main question is put, but no other motion or call shall be in order, except to receive the report of the sergeant at arms or to dispense with the proceedings under the call, and all motions and proceedings authorized by this rule shall be decided without debate, whether on appeal or otherwise. (Senate Rules, 1915, p. 13.)

House.

25. Any member may move the previous question, and if it be seconded by three other members, the previous question shall be put in this form, "The previous question is demanded." The object of this motion is to bring the house to a vote on the pending question without discussion, and if the motion fails, the discussion may proceed the same as if the motion had not been made; if carried, all debate shall cease, and the speaker shall immediately put the question to vote; first, on proposed amendments in their order, and then on the main question, without debate or further amendments: Provided, That a motion to adjourn and a call of the house shall each be in order after the "previous question" has been sustained, and before the main question is put, but no other motion or call shall be in order, except to receive the report of the sergeant-at-arms, or to dispense with the proceedings under the call; and all motions and proceedings authorized by this rule shall be decided without debate, whether on appeal or otherwise. (House Journal, 1911, p. 78.)

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I wish to ask the Senator whether there is not a distinction which he ought to draw between the Senate of the United States and these various legislative bodies, and also between the Senate of the United States and the House of Commons in London, the Reichstag in Berlin, and the Chamber of Deputies in Paris? In all of those cases the members vote in accordance with their judgments and their convictions, and when they come to a vote you get the vote of the majority. In the Senate of the United States, however, in the case of the pending bill, you are not permitting Senators to vote in accordance with their judgments and in accordance with their convictions. You have held a so-called Democratic caucus, and it is notorious that a number of the Democratic Senators here are under caucus compulsion to vote against their judgments and against their convictions; so that to hold them thus bound and then compel a vote is to enable 36 Members of the Senate to represent a majority. Now, those 36 Senators do not constitute a majority of the Senate, and the caucus rule coupled with the cloture would not develop the real sense of the Senate of the United States. It would not give to the majority of the Senate the decision of the question. It would be a mechanical, artificial means of enabling 36 Senators to decide the question. Is not that a distinction?

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I shall be very glad to answer the Senator. I am glad he asked me the question, because it affords me an opportunity to answer, and I wish to answer it frankly and with the truth as I understand it.

I think it the common rule of practice that in all the States party caucuses or conferences are used when desired to obtain party harmony in party action.

Under the system that we have of party government, where the members of each party line up with complete solidarity on either side of the aisle—I may say with complete solidarity, because the exception is very rare—where that is the case, and where there is a conference or caucus on both sides, it comes down to a question of party government; and party government must be controlled by a majority of the members of the party. The party then becomes jointly responsible throughout the Nation for the action of the party in the Senate and House of Representatives. If the party acts unwisely, the Senator from Nebraska will be defeated. If it acts wisely, he will not be defeated, under normal conditions.

That being so, if I have to choose between a Republican caucus or a Republican conference and a Democratic caucus or a Democratic conference, I will prefer to yield some portion of my judgment to my own Democratic colleagues and go with them upon a public question. If I find that I can not in conscience, if I can not as a constitutional duty, go with my colleagues, however painful it may be to me, I shall reluctantly go my way and take the consequences. But when I yield a part of my desire I do so freely and voluntarily for the purpose of accomplishing some measure of good rather than by my negative self-opinionated action preventing anything from being accomplished. I would rather go forward to some extent than try to have my own private opinion dominate the majority of my colleagues and disrupt them and not get anywhere.

I think this practice of the Senate in having no cloture, in having no time fixed for voting, has destroyed debate in the Senate and has driven the debate into a conference room, where colleagues can get together and express their minds and hearts to each other and arrive at some measure of solidarity. That is my opinion about it. I concede to the Senator his right to do as he sees fit about it, but I do not find it against my own conscience or my own free will to yield something in my judgment to my party associates. I am glad to do that, because they yield something to me also.

It is a question of mutual compromise between men who are affiliated together upon a party basis for the public good, and they go to the country upon party performance or party neglect or party success in legislation or party defeat in legislation. I am not willing to defeat the party that put me in power and turn upon them and rend them to pieces. I am not willing to disorganize my party and cooperate with Republicans to defeat my party because the majority of my party colleagues do not submit to dictation from me. I wish to cooperate with my party associates and help them when I can. I certainly would not wish to destroy them. I would prefer to be silent if I can not agree with them and merely give the reasons why I can not go with them.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, I——

Mr. OWEN. Just a moment, and then I will yield further to the Senator. What I want to express is that if we had a cloture we would restore debate in the Senate Chamber, and I would then be glad to listen to debate from Members across the aisle and learn from them, and I would accept from them any proposal that I thought for the common good. In writing the Federal reserve act and taking a part in it many things were proposed by the Republicans which I gladly accepted, as far as I was concerned; and I gave them open credit for it, too.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. How could the Senator accept it if he were restrained by a party caucus?

Mr. OWEN. I was not restrained or coerced by a party caucus. I am glad to cooperate of my own free will. I wish the Senator could appreciate my sentiment in this matter.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, how could he, in the case of this bill, accept it?

Mr. OWEN. In the case of this bill—the shipping bill—we have arrived at a conclusion with regard to what the bill ought to be and have agreed upon it among ourselves. It is not quite what I would prefer, but I am glad to get this much. We have had no method of cooperation with the Republican side of the Chamber, who have fought us on every endeavor we have made on this and every other bill. They have not given us an opportunity. They have lined up solidly and entered into a secret agreement with some of our own Members who were in partial sympathy with them to suddenly and unexpectedly unhorse us, and they have given us no opportunity for free debate here or listening to them. They have given the Democratic Party no opportunity of cooperation, but have tried, by using some of our Members, to wrongfully deprive the Democracy of its right to control the Government and be responsible for government.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The question which I asked the Senator he has not perhaps apprehended, or I think he would have attempted to answer it.

Mr. OWEN. I will attempt to answer it now, if the Senator will repeat it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me put it in the form of an illustration.

The Nebraska Legislature is in session. It is true that there is a limit to debate in that body, but practically every question—and I believe I am safe in saying every question—is decided upon nonpartisan lines. The real majority of the Nebraska Senate, the real majority of the Nebraska House of Representatives, when it comes to vote, votes in accordance with its convictions—each man in accordance with his convictions. When they can so vote it is proper that there should be a cloture; but when men are restrained from voting their own convictions, when you have a machine, when you have a wheel within a wheel, so that 36 men are controlling the votes of 53 men, then I doubt very much whether we should have a cloture.

Mr. OWEN. I do not regard it as controlling my vote when I voluntarily cooperate with other men who are my political colleagues and yield something of my judgment to them when they yield something of their judgment to me. I do not feel like asserting every inch and particle of my opinion and ungenerously yielding nothing whatever to my associates who are generous to me, and then say that I am being coerced by others because I will not cooperate with them. When I cooperate with my associates I do it voluntarily. I do not do it under compulsion. I do it because I want to do it, and because I know it is necessary to party solidarity and to obtaining responsible action of my own party, whose future success depends on present harmony.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator is a Democrat, and he believes in the rule of the majority?

Mr. OWEN. I do, most certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yet this mechanical device of the party caucus destroys the rule of the majority, by giving to 36 men the power to vote 53 men.

Mr. OWEN. There is a certain measure of truth in what the Senator says, and there is also serious deduction or inference which is untrue in what the Senator says. If this body consisted of men chosen upon an open ballot from Nebraska and Missouri and Oklahoma without any party designation, then the caucus would be held on this floor. As it is, the power is intrusted to a party, and in order to have party action the members of it have got to consult among themselves and determine the party action. You do not determine the party action by consulting with Senators on the other side of the Chamber who are hostile to the party, who are laying plans wherever they can to destroy the party and break it down, in order that they may themselves regain control of the country, and who show a greater party solidarity than the Democrats ever do. In a caucus of 53 men all of the members express their views and concede to each other, finally reconciling all differences by a majority vote, because that is the only way such differences can be reconciled. The implication that an organized majority of the 53 members of the caucus get together to tyrannize over the minority of the 53 members is entirely false, I verily believe. Some members constantly in such conferences find themselves now in a majority, now in a minority—and out of mutual concessions present party harmony ensues and future party success may be hoped for.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. OWEN. I yield.

Mr. GALLINGER. If I understood the Senator correctly, he said that the Democratic Party held caucuses and the Republican Party held caucuses, and, of course, he would follow his own party.

Mr. OWEN. I used both terms, "caucus" and "conference."

Mr. GALLINGER. I want to say to the Senator, in all seriousness, I have been here nearly 24 years and have attended every conference when I have been in the city, and the Republican Party has never undertaken to bind its members to vote on any question whatever.

Mr. OWEN. That does not seem to have been necessary.

Mr. GALLINGER. I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. OWEN. I suggested to the Senator that there seemed to be no necessity of imposing a rule upon a party which holds its party solidarity without a caucus.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is begging the question. What I meant to say is that in our conferences, when they are dissolved every member of the conference has a right to vote as he pleases upon any question before the body.

Mr. OWEN. I only infer from the record, and assume that there is some kind of amiable understanding, which seems to be sufficient for that purpose, because no Republican ever votes with the Democrats except on the rarest of occasions. They vote all together, even when they are obviously wrong and even on minor questions.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. THOMAS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will please be in order. The business of the Senate can not be conducted when more than one Senator is talking at a time.

Mr. OWEN. Did the Senator from Utah rise to interrupt me?

Mr. SMOOT. I simply want to add to what the Senator from New Hampshire has already stated, that not only has the Republican Party not held caucuses to bind any Senator, but in all the time I have been a Senator of the United States I have had no President of the United States ask me to vote any way but once, and then President Taft asked me if I could see my way clear to vote for Canadian reciprocity. I told the President I could not, and that I would vote against it.

Mr. OWEN. May I ask the Senator from Utah a question in response?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. OWEN. I merely want to ask the Senator from Utah if it is not a fact that the last Republican President refused patronage to Republican Senators who did not vote the way he wanted them.

Mr. SMOOT. I am sure he did not. I know he did not refuse it to me. I know I voted against Canadian reciprocity and I know a majority of the Republicans voted against it, but I never have heard——

Mr. OWEN. A letter from the former President's secretary was widely published to the effect that the Progressive Republicans were very much grieved at the time and made quite a loud outcry about the treatment they received.

Mr. SMOOT. What the newspapers may say is not always true. I wish to say to the Senator that the only time I was ever asked to vote for any measure by any President was by President Taft, and he asked me if I could not see my way clear to vote for Canadian reciprocity. I told him, "No; I could not"; and I voted against it and did all I could to defeat it, and I know a majority of the Republicans voted against it and tried to defeat it; and I know of none to whom patronage was denied, as the Senator has referred to that, because of the fact that they voted against Canadian reciprocity.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wish to say, Mr. President, that the public were informed, and I have never seen it successfully denied, that the Congress which ended in March, 1911, which had a very large Republican majority in both Houses, and which was therefore controlled by the Republicans in both Houses, seemed to act with singular unanimity, and it was generally understood that the Republican majority of the Senate branch of that Congress voted and legislated under the dictation of a single man, thus making a caucus unnecessary.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. When was that?

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield further?

Mr. OWEN. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMOOT. What was the bill, or to what legislation has the Senator from Colorado reference?

Mr. THOMAS. I have reference, Mr. President, to the legislation that was enacted under the domination of the then senior Senator from Rhode Island, Mr. Aldrich.

Mr. SMOOT. I suppose the Senator means the tariff bill, and I think that he——

Mr. THOMAS. He was the caucus and his mandate was your law.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, that is an assertion made wholly without any truth whatever. I know one thing. I know that he was not the caucus for the Senator from Utah and I do not believe he was the caucus for anyone else on this side.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not think that the Senator from Utah differed very materially from the Senator from Rhode Island during that Congress. My recollection is that he was his chief lieutenant.

Mr. SMOOT. As far as that is concerned, I will say that wherever I believe a principle to be right and any other Senator may believe the same way I am not going to differ with him, if he votes his convictions as I do; and I believe the Senator will admit I always vote what my true convictions are irrespective of what any man in the world may think of it or may say.

Mr. THOMAS. I concede that; but I want Senators to be consistent. I vote my convictions, but I am accused of voting at the dictation of 36 members of my party. Now, is it possible that because 36 members of my party meet in caucus—and I am not afraid of the word "caucus," Mr. President, I believe in it—and because I vote in accordance with what the caucus of my party determines after full deliberation, am I to be accused also of surrendering my convictions, my freedom of action? It remains just the same; and I think my short record in this body will demonstrate the fact, notwithstanding that caucuses seem at present to be so annoying to those who represent the other side and also to some who are on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield further to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SMOOT. There is just one other statement I desire to make.

Mr. OWEN. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, the Senator from Colorado believes in caucuses. I do not. I think some of the worst legislation that was ever enacted in Congress has been the result of caucuses.

Mr. THOMAS. Does the Senator believe in conferences?

Mr. SMOOT. I believe in conferences, but I do not believe the conferences should bind anybody who attends them.

Mr. THOMAS. I have noticed that the conferences which already have been held by my Republican friends have resulted in a unanimity of action and of sentiment that is simply astonishing.

Mr. SMOOT. I can say to the Senator from Colorado that I have attended many conferences where there was a divided vote. I will say this: I do not remember attending a conference of the Republican Party where there has been a unanimity of sentiment.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not know, of course, what is the unanimity of sentiment in the conference. I am talking about the unanimity displayed here.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that there has been no conference held on this bill.

Mr. THOMAS. Then there is a mysterious magnetic something which seems to act of its own volition and which binds our brethren more closely than any caucus even seems to be able to bind this side.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I wish to place in the RECORD at this point the precedents of the English Government, of the French Government, of the German Government, of the Austria-Hungary Government, of the Austrian Government, and of the Governments of Belgium, Denmark, Netherlands, Portugal, Spain, and Switzerland, and, not desiring to take the time of the Senate to read them, I will ask to insert them without reading with the authority from which it is taken.

The matter referred to is as follows:

ENGLISH PRECEDENTS.

"The rule of the majority is the rule in all the parliaments of English-speaking people. In the Parliament of Great Britain, in the House of Lords, the 'contents' pass to the right and the 'not contents' pass to the left, and the majority rules.

"In the House of Commons the 'ayes' pass to the right and the 'noes' pass to the left, and the majority rules. (Encyclopædia Britannica, vol. 20, p. 856.)

"The great English statesman, Mr. Gladstone, having found that the efficiency of Parliament was destroyed by the right of unlimited debate, was led to propose cloture in the first week of the session of 1882, moving this resolution on the 20th of February, and expressing the opinion that the house should settle its own procedure. The acts of Mr. Gladstone and others of like opinion finally led to the termination of unlimited debate in the procedure of Parliament. In these debates every fallacious argument now advanced by those who wish to retain unlimited debate in the United States Senate has been abundantly answered, leaving no ground of sound reasoning to reconsider these stale and exploded arguments.

"The cloture of debate is very commonly used in the Houses of Parliament in Great Britain; for example, in standing order No. 26. The return to order of the House of Commons, dated December 12, 1906, shows that the cloture was moved 112 times. (See vol. 94, Great Britain House of Commons, sessional papers, 1906.)

FRANCE.

"In France the cloture is moved by one or more members crying out 'La cloture!'

"The president immediately puts the question, and if a member of the minority wishes to speak he is allowed to assign his reasons against the close of the debate, but no one can speak in support of the motion and only one member against it. The question is then put by the president, 'Shall the debate be closed?' and if it is resolved in the affirmative the debate is closed and the main question is put to the vote.

"M. Guizot, speaking on the efficacy of the cloture before a committee of the House of Commons in 1848, said:

"I think that in our chamber it was an indispensable power, and I think it has not been used unjustly or improperly generally. Calling to mind what has passed of late years, I do not recollect any serious and honest complaint of the cloture. In the French Chambers, as they have been during the last 34 years, no member can imagine that the debate would have been properly conducted without the power of pronouncing the cloture.

"He also stated in another part of his evidence that—

"Before the introduction of the cloture in 1814 the debates were protracted indefinitely, and not only were they protracted, but at the end, when the majority wished to put an end to the debate and the minority would not, the debate became very violent for protracting the debate, and out of the house among the public it was a source of ridicule.

"The French also allow the previous question, and it can always be moved; it can not be proposed on motions for which urgency is claimed, except after the report of the committee of initiative. (Dickinson's Rules and Procedure of Foreign Parliaments, p. 426.)

GERMANY.

"The majority rule controls likewise in the German Empire and they have the cloture upon the support of 30 members of the house, which is immediately voted on at any time by a show of hands or by the ayes and noes.

AUSTRIA-HUNGARY.

"In Austria-Hungary motions for the closing of the debate are to be put to the vote at once by the president without any question, and thereupon the matter is determined. If the majority decides for a close of the debate, the members whose names are put down to speak for or against the motions may choose from amongst them one speaker on each side, and the matter is disposed of by voting a simple yes or no. (Ibid., p. 404.)

AUSTRIA.

"Austria also, in its independent houses of Parliament, has the cloture, which may be put to the vote at any time in both houses, and a small majority suffices to carry it. This is done, however, without interrupting any speech in actual course of delivery, and when the vote to close the debate is passed each side has one member represented in a final speech on the question. (Ibid., p. 409.)

BELGIUM.

"In Belgium they have the cloture, and if the prime minister and president of the Chamber are satisfied that there is need of closing the debate a hint is given to some member to raise the cry of 'La cloture,' after a member of the opposition has concluded his speech, and upon the demand of 10 members, granting permission, however, to speak for or against the motion under restrictions. The method here does not prevent any reasonable debate, but permits a termination of the debate by the will of the majority. The same rule is followed in the Senate of Belgium. (Dickinson's Rules and Procedure of Foreign Parliaments, p. 420.)

DENMARK.

"In Denmark also they have the cloture, which can be proposed by the president of the Danish chambers, which is decided by the chamber without debate. Fifteen members of the Landsthing may demand the cloture. (Ibid., p. 422.)

NETHERLANDS.

"In both houses of the Parliament of Netherlands they have the cloture. Five members of the First Chamber may propose it and five members may propose it in the Second Chamber. They have the majority rule. (Ibid., p. 461.)

PORTUGAL.

"In Portugal they have the cloture in both chambers, and debate may be closed by a special motion, without discretion. In the upper house they permit two to speak in favor of and two against it. The cloture may be voted. (Ibid., p. 469.)

SPAIN.

"The cloture in Spain may be said to exist indirectly, and to result from the action allowed the president on the order of parliamentary discussion. (Ibid., p. 477.)

SWITZERLAND.

"The cloture exists in Switzerland both in the Conseil des Etat and Conseil National."

Mr. GALLINGER. Has the Senator the rules or the law governing the Canadian Parliament?

Mr. OWEN. No; I have not.

Mr. GALLINGER. They have no previous question, I believe; they have unlimited debate.

Mr. OWEN. They have no need for it, as there is unanimity of sentiment and reciprocal courtesy in their comparatively small Parliament.

Mr. GALLINGER. They succeeded in defeating the reciprocity bill because of that fact.

Mr. OWEN. Oh, I think not "because of that fact," Mr. President. Now, Mr. President, I want to call the attention of the Senate to an editorial from one of the greatest journals of the country that I think is worthy of very respectful attention, the New York World of January 29, 1915:

SET THE SENATE FREE.

The Republican minority in the Senate which is attempting to talk the ship-purchase bill to death is also attempting to talk majority rule to death. If by its filibuster it can prevent action before the expiration of Congress on March 4, it will have defeated majority rule as emphatically as would gunmen at a polling place who drove intending voters away from the ballot box.

It is claimed on behalf of this minority that it is exercising the right of debate and merely asserting the time-honored privileges of the Senate. In truth, it is preventing reasonable debate, and the privileges to which it refers ought to be protected from abuse, as they have been by other legislative bodies. The British House of Commons, the mother of parliaments, exceedingly jealous of every real right and privilege, throttles those who would throttle it—

I commend that sentiment to the attention of the Senate of the United States—

The American House of Representatives has not once been coerced by a minority since the Reed rules were established 25 years ago.

Evidently the time must soon come when a courageous majority of the Senate will emancipate itself from a thraldom humiliating alike to itself and to the people. Every right properly belonging to minorities must be safeguarded, but no minority has a right to rule, no minority has a right to establish by indirection policies which it has not the votes to carry, and no minority anywhere in this country, except in the United States Senate, maintains such a pretense.

The seventeenth amendment, providing for the popular election of Senators, was a Democratic measure in its origin, and to the present Democratic administration fell the honor of proclaiming its adoption. Why should not the same party complete the reform by such a revision of the Senate rules as to strip of power those who obstruct the popular will lawfully expressed?

Now, Mr. President, I want to say just one or two words before I close. Some of our Democratic brethren in the South, still haunted by the old fear of a force bill led by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], believe that it would be dangerous to abandon the alleged right of the minority to conduct an endless filibuster and thereby obstruct anything to which the minority seriously objects. What I want to call to the attention of the Senate is that under the change of the Constitution providing for the direct election of Senators by popular vote the Senate of the United States never can again be made the instrumentality of privilege or plutocracy or monopoly or organized greed; never can again, by a majority of this body, be controlled against the interests and the welfare of the common people of this country. The majority always in the future, till time shall be no more, will represent in truth the sovereignty of the common people of this country. That being so, I do not see how a man who is a heartfelt Democrat can reconcile it to his conscience to put in the hands of those who are at heart opposed to the sovereignty of the people the right to obstruct their will and prevent legislation which the people desire.

I have said on the floor to the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] that this filibuster was preventing the presentation of the rural credits bill. What is the use of a committee bringing forward a bill that has no possible chance of consideration? If that were possible now, if we had a reasonable cloture, the Banking and Currency Committee could get together and in all probability agree upon some measure acceptable to them, acceptable to the Senate, and acceptable to the country. But that is a small part of the terrible harm being done. This filibuster is not only preventing the rural credits bill from being considered; it is preventing this whole calendar, page after page, of listed bills that are important to the country, from receiving any consideration at all. This body is presenting the strange, unthinkable, sad spectacle to the country that a majority is willing to stay here all day and all night, night after night, in order to exercise the constitutional privilege of voting their wishes as representatives of the people of the United States, while an organized filibuster prevents the majority rule; prevents even a vote.

We can not consider rural credits, good roads, waterways, justice to labor, the employment of the unemployed, the public health, and the many vital questions affecting the conservation and development of human life and energy. We are paralyzed by partisan bigotry and ambition.

I say to the Senate that the people of the United States are not going to submit to this wrong any more. It is an outrage on justice; it is shameful; it is despicable; and no words within the scope of a parliamentary language are strong enough to express my condemnation of it.

I yield the floor, Mr. President.

ADDENDUM.

[From the North American Review of November, 1893.]

THE STRUGGLE IN THE SENATE.

II. OBSTRUCTION IN THE SENATE.

[By Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE, of Massachusetts.]

Parliamentary obstruction has of late years engaged public attention to a degree quite unusual for a subject so technical in its nature. When the Reed rules, which first brought the subject into prominence in this country, were under discussion, I pointed out in an article in the Nineteenth Century that the question was widespread and general and in no sense local or peculiar to the United States. At that time the Democratic orators and the Democratic newspapers seemed to think that the effort to do away with parliamentary obstruction in the House of Representatives was a malignant invention of the Republican Party and particularly of Mr. Reed. If they had taken the trouble to inform themselves—a form of mental exercise in which they rarely indulge—they would have discovered that it was nothing of the sort. They would have learned what is now evident to all men that the Republican reform of the rules of the House was but part of a general movement against an abuse which in the process of time had become intolerable. Not only in many States of the Union but in England also the matter of parliamentary obstruction had reached the proportion of a great and a very grave public question. This was neither accidental nor the result of partisanship. It was the outgrowth of conditions which had been slowly developed.

The English-speaking race are the originators of free representative government. Among them this great system has grown to maturity and by them its details have been gradually elaborated. The fundamental principles of popular representation and of free speech, of the control of taxation, and of public expenditures, were established long since as the result of many hard-fought battles. With this development of representative government there should have gone hand in hand a development of the rules by which the representative bodies transacted their business. This, however, did not occur. As so often happens in history, the substance of things changed, but the forms survived. While the power and the business of representative bodies both in England and the United States expanded enormously, the rules in accordance with which these powers were exercised and this business transacted remained unaltered. Ordinarily forms are not of much consequence provided the essence of things is preserved, but in this instance it happened that forms and rules were of vital importance, although it is only very recently that this fact has been fully and properly realized.

The rules and practices of the Congress of the United States and of the House of Commons were adopted under conditions widely different from those which exist to-day. They were formed for representative bodies, in this country at least, much smaller in number, and for the management of the public affairs of small populations, with industrial and commercial interests absolutely insignificant when compared with the vast volume of business to-day, quickened as it now is by the telegraph and the railroad, and beating with a pulsation which is felt in every corner of the globe within 24 hours. The result has been that the old rules and forms have not only proved inadequate for the transaction of business, but have furnished the means for indefinite resistance to action. When parliamentary rules were first formulated, the preservation of freedom of debate was rightly considered to be of the last importance, and, so far as these original rules, which were in great degree haphazard, could be said to have any principle, the protection of freedom of debate was their controlling purpose. All danger to freedom of debate in English-speaking countries at least has long since vanished, and the tendency of the old system is to encourage debate, of which there is now too much, and to prevent action, of which there is now too little.

The primary and the only proper and intelligent object of all parliamentary law and rules is to provide for and to facilitate the ordinary action of public business. When any set of parliamentary rules ceases to accomplish this object they have become an abuse—and an abuse of the worst kind. They not only prevent action, but, what is far worse, they destroy responsibility; for, if a minority can prevent action, the majority, which is entitled to rule and is intrusted with power, is at once divested of all responsibility, the great safeguard of free representative institutions.

This question has been fought out in the English House of Commons and the passage of the home rule bill is conclusive evidence that the system of enforcing action is not only necessary in England, but that it is finally and firmly established. The same battle has been fought out also, and the same result attained, in our own House of Representatives. The great reform which Mr. Reed carried through and which marks an epoch in parliamentary government in the United States has been in principle finally established. Received at the moment with much passionate oratory and many loud objurgations, such as always accompany the onward march and the ultimate triumph of a great reform, it has at last prevailed. As the dust of that memorable conflict cleared away, it was discovered that Mr. Reed had only been enforcing principles which were accepted in nearly every other parliamentary body in the world and that he had not invented them himself for the mere gratification of a tyrannical spirit. Then it was further discovered that his methods, instead of being illegal and unconstitutional, had received the sanction of every judicial body before which they had been brought, and they were finally upheld by the unanimous decision of the Supreme Court of the United States.

The last stage, the acceptance of the reform by the opposite political party, has just been passed. Mr. Speaker Crisp, with a large Democratic majority at his back, has enforced Mr. Reed's principles by stopping dilatory motions and bringing the House to a vote. The only difference has been that Mr. Reed put his principles into practice under accepted methods and in accordance with parliamentary law, while Mr. Crisp very unnecessarily, because no such violence was required, enforced action with entire disregard of the usual and proper forms. He is not, however, to be too severely criticized for this. It was quite natural that the Democratic Party in the House should writhe at adopting the principles and carrying into effect the very methods which they had denounced so exuberantly only three years ago. They appeared to think that they could get around by some bypath to the Republican result, and thus escape a march through the valley of humiliation, if they discarded the forms under which their adversaries had performed the same work. Unfortunately such evasions are never possible and the valley of humiliation can not be avoided by those who have opposed what is righteous, and then, after a short interval, have accepted righteousness for their own purposes. In any event the result is the same. The right of the majority to rule, and to pass after due debate such measures as it sees fit, has been firmly established in the House of Representatives.

As a practical public question in the United States, parliamentary obstruction has now shifted to the Senate, where it has aroused lately the keenest public interest owing to the condition of business and the intense eagerness of the country for the passage of some measure of relief. The case in the Senate is very different in many particulars from what it was either in the House of Commons or the House of Representatives. The Senate of the United States is still a small body; it has great powers conferred upon it by the Constitution and weighty responsibility. It is properly very conservative in its habits and very slow to change those habits in any direction. There could be no better example of this than in its parliamentary procedure. The rules of the Senate are practically unchanged from what they were at the beginning. They are the same now to all intents and purposes as when they were first adopted more than a hundred years ago. There has never been in the Senate any rule which enabled the majority to close debate or compel a vote. The previous question, which existed in the earliest years, and was abandoned in 1806, was the previous question of England and not that with which every one is familiar to-day in our House of Representatives. It was not in practice a form of closure and it is therefore correct to say that the power of closing debate in the modern sense has never existed in the Senate.

The rules of the Senate are few and simple. Formed for the use of a body of 26 Senators, they have continued in force unchanged, until they now govern the deliberations of 88. That rules so simple should have worked so well during so long a period with an increasing number of Senators and an enormous growth in the volume of business is no slight tribute to the character of the body which has worked under them. But they are now beginning to show the same defects and abuses, arising from the same causes, which have produced such fundamental changes in larger representative bodies.

The rules of the Senate, providing for no form of compulsion, rest necessarily on courtesy. In other words, as there is no power to compel action, it is assumed that the need for compulsion will never arise. For this reason, obstruction in the Senate, when it has occurred, has never taken the form of dilatory motions and continual roll calls, which have been the accepted method of filibustering in the House. The weapon of obstruction in the Senate is debate, upon which the Senate rules place no check whatever. Practically speaking, under the rules, or rather the courtesy of the Senate, each Senator can speak as often and at as great length as he chooses. There is not only no previous question to cut him off, but a time can not even be set for taking a vote, except by unanimous consent. This is all very well in theory, and there is much to be said for the maintenance of a system, in one branch at least of the Government, where debate shall be entirely untrammeled. But the essence of a system of courtesy is that it should be the same at all points. The two great rights in our representative bodies are voting and debate. If the courtesy of unlimited debate is granted it must carry with it the reciprocal courtesy of permitting a vote after due discussion. If this is not the case the system is impossible. Of the two rights, moreover, that of voting is the higher and more important. We ought to have both, and debate certainly in ample measure; but, if we are forced to choose between them, the right of action must prevail over the right of discussion. To vote without debating is perilous, but to debate and never vote is imbecile. The difficulty in the Senate to-day is that, while the courtesy which permits unlimited debate is observed, the reciprocal courtesy, which should insure the opportunity to vote, is wholly disregarded.

If the system of reciprocal courtesy could be reestablished and observed, there need be no change in the Senate rules. As it is, there must be a change, for the delays which now take place are discrediting the Senate and this is something greatly to be deplored. The Senate was perhaps the greatest single achievement of the makers of the Constitution. It is one of the strongest bulwarks of our system of government, and anything which lowers it in the eyes of the people is a most serious matter. How the Senate may vote on any given question at any given time is of secondary importance, but when it is seen that it is unable to take any action at all the situation becomes of the gravest character. A body which can not govern itself will not long hold the respect of the people who have chosen it to govern the country.

No extreme or violent change is needed in order to remedy the existing condition of affairs. A simple rule giving the majority power to fix a time for taking a vote upon any measure which has been before the Senate and under discussion, say for 30 days, would be all sufficient. Such a change should be made and such a rule passed, for the majority ought to have and must have full power and responsibility.

On this point of the power of the majority, however, there is a great deal of popular misconception. It is customary to assail with bitter reproaches, as we have seen during the struggle over silver repeal, the minority who are resisting action. This is putting the blame in the wrong place. The minority may be justly censured for not conforming to a system of courtesy, but when that system has been overthrown, as is the case in the Senate in regard to voting and debate, the fault is no longer theirs. No minority is ever to blame for obstruction. If the rules permit them to obstruct, they are lawfully entitled to use those rules in order to stop a measure which they deem injurious. The blame for obstruction rests with the majority, and if there is obstruction it is because the majority permit it. The majority to which I here refer is the party majority in control of the Chamber. They may be divided on a given measure, but they, and they alone, are responsible for the general conduct of business. They, and they alone, can secure action and initiate proceedings to bring the body whose machinery they control to a vote. The long delay on the repeal of the purchasing clause of the silver act of 1890 has been due, without any reference to their internal divisions on the pending question, solely to the Democratic majority as a whole in full control of the Chamber and of the machinery of legislation. There never was a time when they could not have brought about a vote with the assistance of the Chair, whose occupant was also of their party, if, as a party, they had only chosen to do so.

No further argument is, I think, needed to show the necessity of some rule which, after allowing the most liberal latitude of debate, will yet enable the majority of the Senate to compel a vote. The prospects, however, of any such change are not very promising. It is not probable that any form of closure will be adopted by the Senate for some time to come. It will certainly never be attained unless the popular demand for it is not only urgent but intelligent. Newspapers and people generally have a way of rising up and demanding that filibustering be put down and closure enforced whenever some measure in which they are specially interested at the moment is obstructed. On the other hand, filibustering is often regarded as very patriotic by people who do not want a given measure to pass. Many of the newspapers, for example, which have been shouting themselves hoarse over the obstruction to silver repeal in the Senate, loudly applauded precisely the same methods of obstruction when directed against the Federal elections bill a few years ago. It is this fact which takes all weight from the demands of the most vociferous shouters for action at the present time. Obstruction must be always good and proper or always bad and improper. It can not be sometimes good and sometimes bad as a principle of action. If the power to close debate is righteous for one measure it is righteous for all; and until that principle is accepted there is no possibility of reform. For example, the Democratic majority in the Senate refuses to change the rules in order to pass silver repeal. They can not, then, go on and introduce closure to pass the Federal elections bill and the tariff. They must apply closure to all or none.

The only way in which proper rules for the transaction of business in the Senate can be obtained will be through the action of a party committed as a party to the principle that the majority must rule, and that the parliamentary methods of the Senate must conform to that principle. The change must also be made at the beginning of the session, so as to apply to all measures alike which are to come before Congress, and it must be carried and established on its own merits as a general principle of government and not to suit a particular exigency. Whenever this reform is made it will come and it can come only in this way.

HENRY CABOT LODGE.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I desire about 10 minutes of time to address myself briefly to the sole question of so changing the rules of the Senate as to enable the Senate to fix a time for voting on any question pending before it. It would be useless, I think, so far as results here are concerned, to spend further time in answering the objections to the shipping bill which Senators opposing that measure advance to justify their attitude. They have iterated and reiterated those objections until everyone is familiar with them, and they have been answered over and again by Senators who favor the bill, until now the merits of the controversy are fully understood by all Senators and by the country.

Whenever that situation becomes established, as it has been in this case, legitimate debate has served its purpose, and the natural and orderly thing to do is to bring the question at issue to the test of a vote. When legitimate debate has been exhausted, a further pretense of debate degenerates into a mere vocal obstruction of the public business in defiance of the will of the majority. Instead of debate, it becomes a filibuster. The proceedings here for the last few weeks would of themselves make it apparent that the enemies of the pending legislation are engaged upon a filibuster solely to obstruct legislation; but there is no need to speculate upon the motive actuating the other side, for it has been more than once openly admitted that they intend, if they can, to continue obstructive processes to the end of the session. This brings us squarely face to face with the question whether a rule, temporary or permanent, should be adopted under which a bald, defiant filibuster may be terminated.

Mr. President, until now I have looked with disfavor upon any form of cloture in the Senate. I know that the parliamentary practices observed in other countries and in the States of this Union provide for cloture; but I have wished the Senate might continue to constitute one legislative forum in the world where the right of debate could not be arbitrarily cut off. What I have seen here in the last month or more has shaken my attitude on this subject. Debate is one thing; a defiant filibuster, without pretense of legitimate discussion intended to enlighten the Senate or the country, is quite another thing. I believe as much now as ever in allowing a wide range for legitimate discussion on any question before the Senate; but when Senators band together merely to stop the wheels of legislation by processes only intended to prevent action by the Senate, then those engaged upon that enterprise are grossly abusing the privileges of debate.

Mr. President, if obstructive methods like those we have witnessed here through all the weary weeks of the recent past and upon which we are still engaged are to go on unchecked or are to remain permissible or possible then any well-organized minority—even a small minority—may stop the wheels not only of legislation but of the entire Government, and might leave the Government in a position of helplessness and despair. It will not do to say that in instances of especially grave concern, where the honor or life of the Nation was at stake, no contingent of Senators could be found who would resort to such methods as are now being pursued. Who can tell what might suddenly arise with respect to the disorders prevalent in Mexico or with respect to the war in Europe which might, in the opinion of the Government and of a large majority of the Congress, necessitate some urgent and important action, offensive or defensive? We have in this country, as we know, a powerful and widespread sentiment strongly sympathetic with Germany and Austria; and we have also, as we all know, a powerful sentiment favorable to the allies. I am afraid we have many men in public places who are imbued with this feeling of partisan sympathy, some for one side and some for the other. If, unhappily, it should become necessary, in the opinion of the President and the majority of the two Houses, to take or authorize some drastic action by our Government—an event I would deeply deplore and devoutly hope may not occur—but if it should become necessary to take some decisive action for the protection of American rights, I do not regard it as improbable that some public men—I will not particularize more definitely—who are either strongly pro-German or strongly pro-English might stand in the way of the Government. It is easy for gentlemen with strong sympathies or prejudices to find a reason upon which to base a justification of their conduct. At all events, as matters now stand, we are subject to that danger. Ought the Senate to have its hands so tied as to make it helpless in the face of any national emergency?

Again, Mr. President, the people may be so dissatisfied with the policies and conduct of a political party in power as to turn it out of power and put in another party to establish reforms and follow new lines of public policy. That was done two years ago. If proceedings such as have disgraced the Senate for the last month can be prolonged indefinitely, the party newly put into power could be blocked at any time, so far as legislation goes, by the minority. The Senate minority, led by Senators GALLINGER, SMOOT, ROOT, LODGE, and others, could not only laugh in the faces of the President and the Congress, but also could laugh in the face of the American people. That is what they are doing now.

Mr. President, what were these rules of procedure made for? What was the intention of those who framed and made these laws or rules for the government of the Senate? Is it to be presumed that there was an intention, open or concealed, to so frame the rules as to make them a means to prevent the transaction of business by the Senate? I scout the idea. Under the Constitution we know that the Senate is assembled to do business, not to prevent business being done, and we know that the people elect and commission Senators to transact business, not to obstruct it. Therefore the rules must have been made for the purpose of enabling the Senate to proceed with the transaction of its business in an orderly way. That is the spirit of the law under which we act. I repeat, that is the spirit of our Senate law. And now let me say that one of the cardinal principles underlying the construction of a law requires that it should be interpreted and administered according to its true spirit and intent.

I recalled to-day that when a youth I read Blackstone's Commentaries, and that I had read some cardinal rules of interpretation laid down by him. I sent for the books of the great commentator to refresh my memory about what he said. Among other things he said was this:

> The fairest and most rational method to interpret the will of the legislator is by exploring his intentions at the time when the law was made, by signs the most natural and probable. And these signs are either the words, the context, the subject matter, the effects and consequence, or the spirit and reason of the law.

This rule thus laid down has been followed by the commentators on English and American law and by all judges administering the common law. The great commentator from whom I have just quoted declared—now, here is the point—that the most universal and effectual way of discovering the true meaning of a law is by considering the reason and spirit of it, or the cause which moved the legislator to enact it. Commenting on the principles of interpretation which relate to the spirit of the law and to the effects and consequences of a law, he called attention to a Bolognian law which enacted "that whoever drew blood in the streets shall be punished with the utmost severity." And further to illustrate the importance of these rules of interpretation, he referred to a case arising under this Bolognian law, wherein "it was held after long debate not to extend to a surgeon who opened the vein of a person that fell down in the streets in a fit." Here the spirit of the law, and the effects and consequences of the law, prevailed to set aside its letter.

Blackstone referred to another law mentioned by Puffendorf, which forbade a layman to lay hands on priests; but it was adjudged, notwithstanding the letter of the law, that it extended only to him who laid hand on a priest to do him injury. If the letter of our Senate rules, technically construed, would forbid us to lay hands on the freedom of debate, the spirit of the law would justify us in laying on hands to prevent you committing a crime against the liberty of debate, the rights of the Senate, and the rights of the people. Not only would drastic action by the Senate be justified by the spirit of the law, but also because of the effects and consequences of a contrary course.

Blackstone also referred to a case, but by Cicero, where there was a law that those who in a storm forsook the ship should forfeit all property therein, and that the ship and lading should belong entirely to those who stayed with it. In a dangerous tempest all the mariners forsook the ship except only one sick passenger, who by reason of his disease was unable to get out and escape. By chance the ship came to port. The sick man kept possession and claimed the benefit of the law; but it was adjudged that the sick man did not come within the reason of the law, for the reason of making it was to give encouragement to such as should venture their lives to save the vessel. That case was properly decided, as the world admits. The reason of the law prevailed over its letter. But here, Mr. President, we have presented the reverse side of that case. The storm of 1912 drove Republicans from the old ship of State, while we Democrats stayed with her to save her. Under the letter as well as the spirit of the law we are entitled to man the ship; but since we have brought her to port the Republicans have hurtled back, threatening to scuttle her unless we surrender her into their hands. Shall we do it?

Mr. President, the spirit of the law should be observed as against its technical letter, when to observe the technical letter would be to bring about a result never intended by those who made the law. Which should have the greater weight—the technical letter or the spirit of law?

Mr. President, the best that can be said in defense of the filibustering tactics pursued by Senators on the other side is that they are within their technical rights under the letter of the rules. I do not concede that; but I might concede it and take the position, which I do, that the course they are pursuing is so grossly violative of the spirit and intent of the rules that the Senate itself, acting in defense of its own integrity, should observe and enforce the spirit of the rules and stop this outrageous abuse of its power, its rights, and its dignity. In face of the situation as we have it to-day, the Presiding Officer ought to be—and I hope is—brave and strong enough, despite any outburst of yells and whoops, to direct the Secretary to call the ayes and noes when they have been ordered and thus force the issue to a decision. If he should do that, he would receive the plaudits of the American people, even though the filibusters might be able to muster a majority to block him. In an emergency like this I believe Democrats, every man of us, should be on the firing line and fight it out at the point of the bayonet. For one, I want the test made, that we may see how many grenadiers of the guard are left.

Mr. President, having said this much, it is almost needless to add that I am now and henceforth in favor of a reasonable Senate cloture. The question immediately before the Senate is based on the resolution of my colleague [Mr. REED]. In view of the immediate circumstances in which we find ourselves, personally I would prefer to fight it out on the question as it now stands before the Senate without complicating it, at least so far as the Democrats are concerned. But this is something which addresses itself to us more as a matter of form and expediency than of principle. I would rather have the rule made permanent than temporary, but I fear to endanger the existing parliamentary status by a change of program. If we are to accomplish anything, we must have continuity of purpose and cohesiveness in action. We had a Democratic caucus this morning and we took a recess to hold another this evening if our friends on the other side will permit us by not prolonging this session beyond 8 o'clock. But again I say we must try it out, we must have a test of strength, and see whether, in fact, the power of the majority has been definitely transferred from this side to the other side of the Chamber.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. In view of the fact that our Democratic friends had a caucus this morning, and are going to have another caucus this evening, I fear they could not have been very harmonious this morning.

I listened with interest and attention to the address of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], and it is a matter of regret to me that the Senator was so violent in his denunciation of some of us on this side of the Chamber. I equally regret that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] has found it necessary to say that our conduct has been disgraceful, and has even referred by name to certain Senators who have been somewhat instrumental in endeavoring to help our Democratic friends to perfect this bill.

Mr. President, it is interesting to me to hear the Senator from Missouri talk on this subject. The Senator will not have to hark back a great many years when he will find that a bill that was intended to restore the American merchant marine to the seas of the world passed this body, went to the other House, was passed by the other House with a slight amendment, I moved to concur in it, a filibuster was started on the other side, and when the late Senator from Tennessee [Mr. Carmack] was holding the floor the Senator from Missouri asked to interrupt him, having consent given him he opened a book and he proceeded to read in that book until the bill was defeated by this body.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I should like to ask the Senator right there if he approved such conduct? [Laughter.]

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, Mr. President, that is a matter that I do not care to answer. I will say that had not the Senator from Missouri at that time done what he did, whether the conduct was reprehensible or otherwise, we would have had legislation then that would have made it unnecessary for the Senate of the United States now to be talking about the Government either buying or building ships.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. HUGHES. Did anybody ever learn the name of that book?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; it was The Pilgrim's Progress. [Laughter.]

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, that is all I care to say. I am not going to get into any discussion with our friends on the other side who are now so anxious for cloture.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. GALLINGER. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. As the Senator from New Hampshire seems to have condemned the conduct of the Senator from Missouri when the former filibuster was on, and the Senator from Missouri now condemns the filibuster that is in progress, does not the Senator think we who came in here later are justified in voting in favor of a reasonable cloture at any time?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have not condemned the conduct of the Senator from Missouri. I have called attention to a historical fact which has led me to think it most surprising that the Senator from Missouri should now be using the term "disgraceful," and should be charging those of us on this side of the Chamber who have been doing precisely what he did under the rules of the Senate at that time with committing a crime. That was my purpose in it.

Mr. President, I have noticed with a good deal of interest that the Senator from Missouri is in favor of the Presiding Officer violating the rules of this body, and that he is going to carry this bill through at the point of the bayonet if it is necessary. I do not propose to engage in a contest of that kind. I presume the Senator from Missouri would prevail, as between himself and me, if we should engage in a combat of that nature; but I think it is unnecessary and rather undignified for the Senator from Missouri to suggest a resort to physical means to accomplish a legislative result.

Mr. STONE. The Senator knows I did not say that.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, I suppose it was a figure of speech; and yet the Senator lifted his eyes to high heaven, and put on his face that sanctimonious look which he sometimes assumes, and I really thought at the time that the Senator was ready for mortal combat to carry this bill through the Senate.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. GALLINGER. I always yield to the Senator from Kentucky. I will say to him, however, that I do not propose to transfer him and put him in the place of the Senator from Missouri. [Laughter.] If we were to have a bayonet charge, I should retire at once.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I am a thoroughly peaceable man. I do not want to engage in any sort of conflict; but I want to inquire of the Senator if he knows of any rule in this body that denies to the Senate the right to have a roll call upon the previous question?

Mr. GALLINGER. Why, I think there is no rule at all that warrants it.

Mr. JAMES. But is there any that forbids it?

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, well, it does not follow at all that that is necessary. We have our rules. They are written in pretty good English and each of us can interpret them for himself. I know the Senator from Kentucky believes that this body can enforce a previous question. I have heard him say so. I do not believe there is any authority whatever for it.

Mr. JAMES. Is it not true that in the absence of a rule of the Senate, which the Senator admits the Senate has not, general parliamentary law gives every legislative body in the world the inherent right to do business?

Mr. GALLINGER. Not at all, Mr. President. General parliamentary law is always supplanted by the specific rules of a legislative body. That is a principle that the Senator from Kentucky ought to understand as well as I do.

Mr. JAMES. There is no doubt about that; but the Senator admits that there is no such inhibition in these rules against the previous question. Now, in the absence of it, my contention is that the Senate has the right to govern itself, to stop this filibuster. I have no hesitancy in saying that if I were the Presiding Officer of the Senate, and a Senator should rise and move the previous question upon this bill, I would submit it to the Senate upon a roll call; and I believe that action would be approved by the American people, and is in accord with the holding of every writer upon parliamentary law in the world.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, some of us have been afraid that might happen when the Senator from Kentucky gets in the chair.

Mr. JAMES. Well, it would happen if I were in the chair, I will say, and the motion for the previous question were made. I would submit it to a majority of the Senators upon a roll call of the Senate, without debate.

Mr. GALLINGER. When that does happen we will test that question.

Mr. President, I have said all I care to say.

Mr. JAMES. I would submit to a roll call of a majority of the Senate the right to rule itself; and I say that no Senator here and no citizen of America can take the position that a majority is not entitled to rule, even in the Senate of the United States, which has been so long the bulwark of greed and special privilege.

Mr. GALLINGER. Oh, well, Mr. President, we have gotten "greed and special privilege" now. I do not know what that has to do with this question. I presume the Senator from Kentucky does.

Mr. JAMES. The people of the United States know what it has to do with this question, if the Senator does not.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. STONE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 10 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 57 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, February 15, 1915, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 13, 1915.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Father in heaven, draw us by the unseen forces at Thy command into Thy nearer presence that our thoughts and acts may be dominated by Thy will, that with self-control, self-respect, and efficiency we may be the instruments in Thy hands for the furtherance of all good, and thus know the art of living together in harmony, working together in harmony to the glory and honor of Thy holy name, in the spirit of the Master. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PROHIBITING CHILD LABOR.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print a supplementary report from the Committee on Labor on the Palmer child-labor bill (H. R. 12292). I will say that when the bill was reported no full report was made, but the report that I now ask to file contains a complete discussion of the subject matter.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why not withdraw the first report?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. In connection with that, Mr. Speaker, I will request unanimous consent to withdraw the original report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to withdraw the report heretofore made on the Palmer child-labor bill and file a new report (No. 1400). Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

NIAGARA FALLS.

Mr. FLOOD of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to file minority views (H. Rept. 990, pt. 2) to the report on the bill known as the Niagara bill, controlling the power companies at Niagara Falls (H. R. 16542). The majority report was filed some time ago, but by mistake the minority views did not accompany it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to file minority views on the Niagara bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MONTAGUE, indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. O'SHAUNESSY, indefinitely, on account of illness.

HOUR OF MEETING ON MONDAY.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, next Monday is unanimous-consent day, and there may not be many opportunities for unanimous consent after that time. In order that there may be time to call the calendar through, if possible, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-morrow it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-morrow it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock on Monday next. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 21318, the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. CRISP in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill, of which the Clerk will report the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 21318) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and for other purposes.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The item under consideration is the Department of Justice, and I wish to say a word.

On February 1 the Supreme Court handed down a decision holding that under the Criminal Code an indictment might be had against both the woman as well as the man for conspiring to violate the white-slave act. Under a headline of that date an article was published in the Chicago Tribune of February 2 referring to this decision, and in the course of the article the following statement was made:

The Department of Justice was greatly pleased with the decision. Ever since the Mann Act was passed the department has had its hands full of white-slave cases in which the men were punished, although they were the victims of scheming women. In fact, it has had more of these cases than those in which women were the victims of men.

While this article was published under a Washington date line, I do not feel certain whether this portion of the article was written in Washington or written in the newspaper office in Chicago, and I do not undertake to say. The inference from the statement was that the Department of Justice had, in fact, reported that there were more cases in which men were punished where they were the victims of women than there were of cases in which women were the victims of men. The assumption that this was reported from the Department of Justice was carried out in a newspaper editorial published in the Chicago Tribune on February 3, the next day, in which the Tribune editorially made this statement:

The Federal Department of Justice is said to regard the decision of the Supreme Court in the Clara Holte case as an effective check upon the abuse of the Mann Act for the purpose of blackmail. As the department reports more cases in which men are the victims of blackmailing conspiracies under this law than cases of real "white slavery," the need for some check is plain. That it comes through judicial interpretation rather than explicit amendment is to be regretted.

Of course from my standpoint the newspaper statement, to begin with, bore on its face the fact that it was erroneous. Everyone ought to know that the Department of Justice would not be prosecuting any case where they believed that the person accused, although a man, was the victim of some scheming woman. I say I think it bore upon its face the statement, but because I thought that the Department of Justice ought to be placed fairly before the country, and the country ought to know that the Department of Justice was not engaged in punishing men who were victims of scheming women, I wrote the Department of Justice asking for information, and sent the following letter to the Attorney General:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., February 5, 1915.

Hon. THOMAS W. GREGORY,
Attorney General, Washington, D. C.

SIR: In a news article published in the Chicago Tribune of February 2, commenting upon the recent decision of the Supreme Court relating to conspiracies to violate the white-slave act, the following statement is made:

"The Department of Justice was greatly pleased with the decision. Ever since the Mann Act was passed the department has had its hands full of white-slave cases in which the men were punished, although they were the victims of scheming women. In fact, it has had more of these cases than those in which women were the victims of men."

I inclose the article and beg to ask that the clipping be returned to me with your reply.

Is it true that since the Mann Act was passed the Department of Justice has had its hands full of white-slave cases in which the men were punished, although they were the victims of scheming women, and that it has had more of these cases than those in which women were the victims of men, and has the department made such a statement?

May I ask whether there have been any cases in which men were punished by prosecution of the Government under this act, although the men were the victims of scheming women? May I ask how many convictions have been had under the white-slave act, and how many of these were cases where men were convicted, although it was shown that they were the victims of scheming women?

An early reply will very greatly oblige,

Yours, sincerely,

JAMES R. MANN, Member of Congress.

The Attorney General replied to that letter as follows:

OFFICE OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., February 6, 1915.

Hon. JAMES R. MANN,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR SIR: Answering your letter of the 5th instant as to prosecutions under the white-slave traffic act:

While this department has been confronted with occasional cases wherein the facts have made it more or less certain that the complaining women were influenced by mercenary considerations, or themselves arranged and planned to induce the man to transport them, it is not true that it has had its hands full of such cases; nor, much less, is it true that it has had its hands full of such cases in which the men were punished; nor is it true that such cases outnumber the genuine "women-victim" cases. Therefore the statement to that effect, quoted in your letter as appearing in an article in the Chicago Tribune, is entirely unfounded, and made without authority of this department.

There have been to January 1 of this year 1,014 convictions under the white-slave traffic act since its approval; 159 acquittals; 145 cases were dismissed; and 320 cases are still pending. There is no classification of cases along the lines referred to in the article in question.

It is the belief of the department that the cases in which convictions were had are cases in which the interests of justice were subserved thereby.

Very sincerely,

T. W. GREGORY,
Attorney General.

That is the letter from the Attorney General, and while it ought not to be necessary to say that the Department of Justice is not engaged, on the very face of it could not be engaged, in prosecuting cases where they believed the accused was a victim rather than a violator of the law, still, in view of the fact that the statement was made as it was in the Tribune and various other papers of the country, I think it is proper to make this statement.

Under leave to extend I append herewith the decision of the Supreme Court in the case referred to, together with the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Lamar:

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

NO. 628—OCTOBER TERM, 1914.

The United States, plaintiff in error, v. Clara Holte, in error to the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Wisconsin.

[February 1, 1915.]

Mr. Justice Holmes delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an indictment for a conspiracy between the present defendant and one Laudenschleger, that Laudenschleger should cause the defendant to be transported from Illinois to Wisconsin for the purpose of prostitution, contrary to the act of June 25, 1910 (ch. 396, 36 Stat., 825). As the defendant is the woman, the district court sustained a demurrer on the ground that although the offense could not be committed without her she was no party to it but only the victim. The single question is whether that ruling is right. We do not have to consider what would be necessary to constitute the substantive crime under the act of 1910, or what evidence would be required to convict a woman under an indictment like this, but only to decide whether it is impossible for the transported woman to be guilty of a crime in conspiring as alleged.

The words of the penal code of March 4, 1909 (ch. 350, sec. 37), are "conspire to commit an offense against the United States," and the argument is that they mean an offense that all the conspirators could commit, and that the woman could not commit the offense alleged to be the object of the conspiracy. For, although the statute of 1910 embraces matters to which she could be a party, if the words are taken literally—for instance, aiding in procuring any form of transportation for the purpose—the conspiracy alleged, as we have said, is a conspiracy that Laudenschleger should procure transportation and should cause the woman to be transported. Of course the words of the penal code could be narrowed as we have suggested, but in that case they would not be as broad as the mischief, and we think it plain that they mean to adopt the common law as to conspiracy and that "commit" means no more than bring about. For, as was observed in Drew v. Thaw (Dec. 21, 1914), a conspiracy to accomplish what an individual is free to do may be a crime (Reg. v. Mears, 4 Cox. C. C., 423; 2 Den. C. C., 79; Reg. v. Howell, 4 F. and F., 160), and even more plainly a person may conspire for the commission of a crime by a third person. We will assume that there may be a degree of cooperation that would not amount to a crime, as where it was held that a purchase of spirituous liquor from an unlicensed vendor was not a crime in the purchaser although it was in the seller. (Commonwealth v. Willard, 22 Pick., 476.) But a conspiracy with an officer or employee of the Government or any other for an offense that only he could commit has been held for many years to fall within the conspiracy section, now section 37 of the penal code. (United States v. Martin, 4 Cliff., 156, 164; United States v. Bayer, 4 Dillon, 407, 410; United States v. Stevens, 44 Fed Rep., 132, 140; State v. Huegin, 110 Wis., 189, 246.) So a woman may consire to procure an abortion upon herself when under the law she could not commit the substantive crime and therefore, it has been held, could not be an accomplice. (The Queen v. Whitchurch, 24 Q. B. D., 420, 422; Solander v. The People, 2 Colo., 48, 63; State v. Crofford, 133 Iowa, 478, 480.)

So we think that it would be going too far to say that the defendant could not be guilty in this case. Suppose, for instance, that a professional prostitute, as well able to look out for herself as was the man, should suggest and carry out a journey within the act of 1910 in the hope of blackmailing the man, and should buy the railroad tickets, or should pay the fare from Jersey City to New York, she would be within the letter of the act of 1910, and we see no reason why the act should not be held to apply. We see equally little reason for not treating the preliminary agreement as a conspiracy that the law can reach, if we abandon the illusion that the woman always is the victim. The words of the statute punish the transportation of a woman for the purpose of prostitution even if she were the first to suggest the crime. The substantive offense might be committed without the woman's consent; for instance, if she were drugged or taken by force. Therefore the decisions that it is impossible to turn the concurrence necessary to effect certain crimes, such as bigamy or dueling, into a conspiracy to commit them do not apply. Judgment reversed.

Mr. Justice McReynolds took no part in the consideration and decision of this case.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

NO. 628.—OCTOBER TERM, 1914.

The United States, plaintiff in error, v. Clara Holte, in error to the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Wisconsin.

[February 1, 1915.]

Mr. Justice Lamar, dissenting:

I dissent from the conclusion that a woman can be guilty of conspiring to have herself unlawfully transported in interstate commerce for purposes of prostitution.

Congress had no power to punish immorality, and certainly did not intend by this act of June 25, 1910 (35 Stat., 825), to make fornication or adultery, which was a State misdemeanor, a Federal felony, punishable by $5,000 fine and five years' imprisonment. But when it appeared that there was a traffic in women to be used for purposes of prostitution, debauchery, and immoral purposes, Congress legislated so as to prohibit their interstate transportation in such vicious business. That there was such traffic in women and girls; that they were "literally slaves," "owned and held as property and chattels," and that their traffickers made large profits, is set out at length in the reports of the House and Senate committees (61st Cong., 2d sess.) recommending the passage of the bill. So that an argument based on the use of the words "slaves," "enslaved," "traffic in women," "business in women," "subject of transportation," and the like—which might otherwise appear to be strained—is amply justified by the amazing facts which those reports show as to the existence and extent of the business and the profits made by the traffickers in women. The argument based on the use of these words and what they imply is further justified by the fact that the statute itself declares (sec. 8) that it shall be known as the "white slave traffic act." In giving itself such a title the statute specifically indicates that while of right woman is not an object of merchandise or traffic, yet for gain she has by some been wrongfully made such for purposes of prostitution, and that trade Congress intended to bar from interstate commerce.

The act either applies to women who are willingly transported or it does not. If it does not apply to those who willingly go (H. R. 47, 61st Cong., 2d sess., p. 10), then there was no offense by the man who transported her or in the woman who voluntarily went, and in that event there was, of course, no conspiracy against the laws of the United States in her agreeing to go. The indictment here, however, assumes that the act applies not only to those who are induced to go but also to those who aid the panderer in securing their own transportation. On that assumption every woman transported for the purposes of the business stands on the same footing, and can not by her consent change her legal status. And if she can not be directly punished for being transported she can not be indirectly punished by calling her assistance in the transportation a conspiracy to violate the laws of the United States. For if she is within the circle of the statute's protection she can not be taken out of that circle by the law of conspiracy and thus be subjected to punishment because she agreed to go.

The statute does not deal with the offense of fornication and adultery, but treats the woman who is transported for use in the business of prostitution as a victim—often a willing victim, but nevertheless a victim. It treats her as enslaved and seeks to guard her against herself as well as against her slaver—against the wiles and threats, the compulsion and inducements, of those who treat her as though she was merchandise and a subject of interstate transportation. The woman, whether coerced or induced, whether willingly or unwillingly transported for purposes of prostitution, debauchery, and immorality, is regarded as the victim of the trafficker, and she can not therefore be punished for being enslaved nor for consenting and agreeing to be transported by him for purposes of such business. To hold otherwise would make the law of conspiracy a sword with which to punish those whom the traffic act was intended to protect.

The fact that prostitutes and others have used this statute as a means by which to levy blackmail may furnish a reason why that should be made a Federal offense, so that she and they can be punished for blackmail or malicious prosecution. But these evils are not to be remedied by extending the law of conspiracy so as to treat the enslaved subject of transportation as a guilty actor in her own transportation, and then punish her because she agreed with her slaver to be shipped in interstate commerce for purposes of prostitution. Such a construction would make every willing victim indictable for conspiracy. Even that elastic offense can not be extended to cover such a case.

There are no decisions dealing directly with the question as to whether a woman assisting in her own illegal transportation can be prosecuted for conspiracy. There are, however, a number of authorities dealing with somewhat analogous subjects. For example, in prosecutions for abortion "the woman does not stand legally in the situation of an accomplice, for although she no doubt participated in the immoral offense imputed to the defendant, she could not have been indicted for the offense. The law regards her as the victim rather than the perpetrator." (Dunn v. People, 28 N. Y., ——; Commonwealth v. Wood, 11 Gray, 86; State v. Hoyer, 39 N. J. Law, 608; State v. Murphy, 27 N. J. Law, 114; Commonwealth v. Follanbee, 155 Mass., 274; State v. Owen, 22 Minn., 244; Watson v. State, 9 Tex. App., 238. Keller v. State, 102 Ga., 510 (seduction). Contra apparently in England and Colorado. Queen v. Whitchurch, 24 Q. B. D., 240; Solander v. People, 2 Colo.) So, too, a person who knowingly purchases liquor from one unauthorized to sell it is not guilty of a criminal offense and is not an accomplice. (State v. Teahan, 50 Conn., 100; Commonwealth v. Pillsbury, 12 Gray, 126; People v. Smith, 28 Hun., 626; affirmed on opinion below; 92 New York, 661; State v. Roslin, 37 Minn., 212.)

Where the purchaser of liquor sold in violation of law was prosecuted for inducing the seller to commit a crime, the court said:

"Every sale implies a purchaser; there must be a purchaser as well as a seller, and this must have been known and understood by the legislature. Now, if it were intended that the purchaser should be subject to any penalty, it is to be presumed that it would have been declared in the statute, either by imposing a penalty on the buyer in terms or by extending the penal consequences of the prohibited act to all persons aiding, counseling, or encouraging the principal offender. There being no such provision in the statute, there is a strong implication that none such was intended by the legislature." (Commonwealth v. Willard, 22 Pick., 479.)

United States v. Dietrich (126 U. S., 667), though not directly in point, sheds light on the subject. There two persons were indicted under Revised Statute 5440 for conspiring to violate that law of the United States (Rev. Stat., 1781) which makes it a criminal offense to agree to give or to receive a bribe. The court held that agreeing to give or receive a bribe was the substantive offense and not a conspiracy. For when an offense, as bigamy or adultery, requires for its completion the concurrence of two persons, "the Government can not evade the limitations by indicting as for a conspiracy."

And in Queen v. Terryll (1 Q. B., 711), where a girl under 15 years of age was prosecuted for inciting a man to commit adultery with her, one of the judges considered that she could not be found guilty, because she was under the age of consent, and the other said that the statute did not apply because "there is no trace in the statute of any intention to treat the women or girls as criminals."

Applying these cases it appears that under the white-slave traffic act there must be a woman who is transported and a person who compels or induces her to be transported or who aids her in such transportation. "There is no trace in the statute of any intention to treat the women or girls as criminals" for being transported nor for agreeing that they will be transported, nor for aiding in the transportation. And if, as said in Commonwealth v. Willard (22 Pick., 479), Congress had intended that they should be subject to indictment for conspiracy, "it would have so declared by extending the penal consequences of the prohibited act to all persons aiding, counseling, or encouraging the principal offender." There being no such provision in the statute, there is a strong implication that none such was intended by the legislature.

To this may be added the practical consideration that any construction making the woman liable for participation in the transportation will not only tend to prevent her from coming forward with her evidence, but in many instances she will be in position to claim her privilege and can refuse to testify on the ground that she might thereby subject herself to prosecution for conspiracy in that she aided in the violation of the law, even though it was intended for the protection of her unfortunate class.

The woman, whether treated as the willing or an unwilling victim of such transportation for such business purposes, can not be found guilty of the main offense nor punished for the incidental act of conspiring to be enslaved and transported. Indeed, if she could be so punished for conspiring with her slaver, the fundamental idea that makes the act valid would be destroyed. She would cease to be an object of traffic; and instead of being the subject of illegal transportation would not be transported by a slaver as an object of interstate commerce, so as to be subject to regulative prohibitions under the commerce clause, but would be voluntarily traveling on her own account and punishable by the laws of the State for prostitution practiced after her arrival.

I am authorized to say that Mr. Justice Day concurs in this dissent.

Clerk Supreme Court United States.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, by permission of the chairman of the committee, I ask unanimous consent to return for a moment to page 111 of the bill for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to recur to page 111 of the bill for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 111, after line 12, by inserting the following as a paragraph:

"Rocky Mountain National Park, Colo.: For protection and improvement, $8,000."

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago I reported and the House passed a bill creating the Rocky Mountain National Park in Colorado. The bill was approved by the President on the 26th of January. The Treasury Department and the Interior Department have made a report to the committee recommending an appropriation of $8,000 for the next fiscal year and $3,000 for the remainder of the current year. My understanding is that the $8,000 should go into this bill and that the $3,000 should be included in the emergency deficiency appropriation bill when it is brought in, in compliance with the recommendations of the Interior Department and the Treasury Department, which have been approved by the President.

The estimates that I refer to are as follows:

ESTIMATE OF APPROPRIATION, ROCKY MOUNTAIN NATIONAL PARK.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, January 30, 1915.

The SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith, for the consideration of Congress, copy of a communication of the Secretary of the Interior of this date submitting two estimates of appropriations for the protection and improvement of Rocky Mountain National Park, Colo., under the act entitled "An act to establish the Rocky Mountain National Park in the State of Colorado, and for other purposes," approved January 26, 1915 (Public, No. 238), as follows:

For the fiscal year 1916	$8,000
For the fiscal year 1915	3,000

Respectfully,

W. G. MCADOO, Secretary.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 30, 1915.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: The act of Congress approved January 26, 1915, to establish the Rocky Mountain National Park in the State of Colorado, and for other purposes, sets apart certain lands in that State as a public park for the benefit and enjoyment of the people of the United States, and places the same under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior. The act, however, makes no appropriation for administration of the park, but it provides (sec. 4) that no appropriation for maintenance, supervision, or management of the park in excess of $10,000 annually shall be made unless the same shall have first been expressly authorized by law.

With a view to carrying into effect the provisions of the statute requiring the Secretary of the Interior to supervise the management of the park I have to submit herewith two estimates for protection and improvement of the Rocky Mountain National Park in amounts, respectively, $3,000 for that portion of the current fiscal year between February 1 and June 30, 1915, and $8,000 for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, together with a memorandum as to the proposed expenditure thereof, and have to recommend that the same be transmitted to Congress for favorable consideration. These estimates have been submitted to the President and have received his approval.

Cordially, yours, FRANKLIN K. LANE.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. Chairman, I move the adoption of the amendment I have offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Colorado.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE.

LIGHTHOUSE SERVICE.

General expenses: For supplies, repairs, maintenance, and incidental expenses of lighthouses and other lights, beacons, buoyage, fog signals, lighting of rivers heretofore authorized to be lighted, light vessels, other aids to navigation, and lighthouse tenders, including the establishment, repair, and improvement of beacons and day marks and purchase of land for same, the establishment of post lights, buoys, submarine signals, and fog signals, the establishment of oil or carbide houses, not to exceed $10,000: Provided, That any oil or carbide house erected hereunder shall not exceed $550 in cost; construction of necessary outbuildings at a cost not exceeding $200 at any one light station in any fiscal year, the improvements of grounds and buildings connected with light stations and depots, wages of laborers attending post lights, pay of temporary employees and field force while engaged on works of general repair and maintenance, and pay of laborers and mechanics at lighthouse depots; rations and provisions or commutation thereof for keepers of lighthouses, officers and crews of light vessels and tenders, and officials and other authorized persons of the Lighthouse Service on duty on board of such tenders or vessels, and money accruing from commutation for rations and provisions for the above-named persons on board of tenders and light vessels may be paid on proper vouchers to the person having charge of the mess of such vessels, reimbursement under rules prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce of keepers of light stations and masters of light vessels and of lighthouse tenders for rations and provisions and clothing furnished shipwrecked persons who may be temporarily provided for by them, not exceeding in all $5,000 in any fiscal year, fuel and rent of quarters where necessary for keepers of lighthouses, the purchase of land sites for fog signals, the rent of necessary ground for all such lights and beacons as are for temporary use or to mark changeable channels and which in consequence can not be made permanent, the rent of offices, depots, and wharves, traveling expenses, including per diem in lieu of subsistence allowed pursuant to section 13 of the sundry civil appropriation act approved August 1, 1914, mileage, library books for light stations and vessels, and technical books and periodicals not exceeding $1,000, and for all other contingent expenses of district offices and depots and for contingent expenses of the office of the Bureau of Lighthouses in Washington, $2,775,000.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I make the motion as preliminary to a statement I desire to make leading up to a request for unanimous consent to recur to pages 112 and 113 of the bill to the items respecting Howard University, which were struck out of the bill on a point of order made by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON]. I do so in order that I may call to the attention of the Chair a law which seems to have escaped the attention of the chairman and the members of the committee, and which is to be found in Twenty-seventh United States Statutes at Large, page 327. This law also seems to have escaped the attention of the Secretary in drawing up the estimates, although it is contained in the United States compiled statutes. The Chair will, of course, realize that when there is in the appropriation "for maintenance of Howard University," the question instantly arises in everyone's mind as to whether that means maintenance for just that particular year or maintenance hereafter.

ANNUAL REPORTS AND ESTIMATES.

On those words alone it would be construed as applying only to that particular fiscal year, but I find that in the years 1891, 1892, and 1893 there was a provision for an annual report; that the officers of the institution should report annually to the Secretary of the Interior, and in the year 1892 those words were followed by the statement that the Secretary of the Interior should send in estimates for the next fiscal year. I desire to read the exact words which occur after the use of the words "for maintenance of Howard University," and also providing that part of the money should be paid by the United States and part by voluntary donations. The law of 1892 then reads as follows:

And the proper officers of said university shall report annually to the Secretary of the Interior how the appropriation is expended; and the Secretary of the Interior shall estimate in detail for the next fiscal year the items of expenditure provided for in this paragraph.

Mr. Chairman, I respectfully submit to the Chair that this House would never want to be governed, nor would the Chairman, by the decision which the Chair made without seeing a law which has been overlooked. I submit also that when the law says "annually" it defines the maintenance as being through a course of years and permanent, and not for that particular year, and when, after providing that the officers of the institution shall report annually how the appropriation was expended and that the Secretary of the Interior shall estimate in detail for the next fiscal year the items of expenditure provided for in the paragraph, it is in fact a direction permanently to include this institution in the estimates upon which appropriations are to be made, and therefore construes the words "for the maintenance of Howard University" as though it read "for the maintenance hereafter of Howard University."

I felt it to be my duty to bring this matter immediately to the attention of the committee. I want to say that I am somewhat embarrassed by the absence of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON], whom I do not see in the Chamber at the present time, but when he returns I desire to ask unanimous consent to recur to the items for the purpose of bringing the matter again to the attention of the committee.

Under the leave to extend his remarks, Mr. PARKER of New Jersey submits the following:

The question arises under Rule XXI, clause 2—

No appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation bill, or be in order as an amendment thereto, for any expenditure not previously authorized by law, unless in continuance of appropriations for such public works and objects as are already in progress.

EDUCATION A PUBLIC WORK.

Argument may justly be made that education is a public object. A national university was urged by Washington. Schools are maintained and aided in all of our appropriation bills. This university is in the District of Columbia, a territory wholly subject to the jurisdiction of the United States, and any school or college within that District is doing a public work for the benefit of the people of that District and for the country.

Appropriations for that public work may be continued under the second clause of the rule.

The university was incorporated by special act of Congress March 2, 1867. (14 U. S. Stats., p. 438.)

It has done a great public work, not exclusively confined to the colored race, but especially among them, and its benefits are admitted by all.

MAINTENANCE IMPLIES CONTINUATION AND IMPROVEMENT.

The appropriation is for maintenance. This very word involves the continuance of previous appropriations.

Maintenance of Howard University means also permanent continuance of that institution. The first meaning of maintenance is "to hold or preserve in any particular state or condition; keep from falling, declining, or ceasing." It does not mean merely to pay expenses.

This appropriation has always included details for tools, book shelving, furniture and fixtures, improvement of grounds and repairs of buildings, and materials and apparatus for laboratories. All these are permanent.

The word "maintenance" is explained by this bill. We have maintenance of the Panama Canal, of the zone, of lights for shipping.

An appropriation to maintain or preserve an institution necessarily involves authority to continue to preserve it, or else it would not be maintained or preserved.

ANNUAL APPROPRIATIONS CONTEMPLATE FUTURE.

The act of 1892 (27 Stats., 372, Aug. 5, 1892) expressly provides for the future, as already quoted, that there shall be annual reports and annual estimates in detail for the next fiscal year. The language as to appropriation for maintenance is as follows:

And the proper officials of said university shall report annually to the Secretary of the Interior how the appropriation is expended, and the Secretary of the Interior shall estimate in detail for the next fiscal year the items of expenditure provided for in this paragraph.

If the officials of the university are obliged to report annually how the appropriation is expended, this certainly is a law authorizing such appropriation, and, if on receiving such reports, the Secretary is to estimate in detail for the next fiscal year, the authority to estimate implies the authority to appropriate.

Certainly the word "annually" ought to be as strong as the word "hereafter."

PERMANENT REGULATIONS "HEREAFTER."

By the sundry civil appropriation bill of July 1, 1898, there was a proviso that no part of that appropriation should be used for the theological department or be paid until the university should give to the Secretary of the Interior or his agents authority to visit and inspect such university and to control and supervise all the moneys appropriated, and then a permanent regulation is made.

The president and directors of the Howard University shall report to the Secretary of the Interior the condition of the institution on the 1st day of July of each year, embracing therein the number of pupils received and discharged or leaving the same for any cause during the preceding year and the number remaining; also, the branches of knowledge and industry taught and the progress made therein, together with a statement showing the receipts of the institution and from what sources and its disbursements and for what objects. (30 Stats., 624.)

Howard University then became a Government institution, with absolute Government control as to its expenditures; and by the sundry civil appropriation bill of March 3, 1899 (30 Stats., 1101), the magic word "hereafter" is used. It is provided that thereafter no part of the appropriation shall be used for the theological department or be paid until the university should give the Secretary of the Interior or his agents full authority and power to visit and inspect the university and control and supervise the expenditure of all the appropriations.

Provided, That hereafter no part of the appropriations made by Congress for the Howard University shall be used, directly or indirectly, for the support of the theological department of said university, nor for the support of any sectarian, denominational, or religious instruction therein: And provided further, That no part thereof shall be paid to said university until it shall accord to the Secretary of the Interior, or to his designated agent or agents, authority to visit and inspect such university and to control and supervise the expenditure therein of all moneys paid under said appropriations.

CONTROL WAS EXERCISED.

The institution thereupon became thereafter for all time such a public institution of the District of Columbia and absolutely subject to the control of the Secretary of the Interior, so far as appropriations were concerned.

The United States exercised such absolute power. By the sundry civil act of March 3, 1903 (32 Stats., 1113), a new Freedmen's Hospital building was authorized, the cost to be charged one-half to the District—

Provided further, That the trustees of Howard University shall be required to supply all medical and surgical service without cost to the United States or to the District of Columbia.

That requirement certainly treats them as a public institution, and by the sundry civil appropriation bill of April 28, 1904 (33 Stats., 488), a whole block of 11 acres was retroceded to Howard University on condition that they make to the United States a perpetual lease at $1 a year for the purposes of the Freedmen's Hospital.

Freedmen's Hospital: The appropriation of $50,000 made by the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1904 is hereby continued for the fiscal year 1905: Provided, That the tract of land lying and being between Sixth and Fourth Streets and between Pomeroy and College Streets, in the city of Washington, D. C., containing approximately 11 acres of ground, be, and the same is hereby, retroceded to Howard University upon the condition that the said Howard University shall make and execute to the United States a perpetual lease for the nominal rental of $1 per annum, and that upon the execution of such lease to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior said Secretary shall cause to be erected on the ground so retroceded and leased the new hospital for freedmen provided for by the act above referred to. (33 Stats., 488.)

By the act of March 3, 1905 (33 Stats., 1190), all moneys paid by the District for charity patients in the hospital shall go to the Secretary of the Interior.

I have confined myself to the statutes. It is hardly needful to go into the history of Freedmen's legislation, of their pay and bounties which remained in the United States Treasury, of the many committee reports urging that this money should be used for the education of colored youth, or of the good work done by this institution. The theological department has been abandoned; the moneys appropriated goes to manual training, schools in science, law, and medicine, and this last school furnishes the physicians for the Freedmen's Hospital free of cost to the United States. (Book of Estimates for 1916, p. 840.)

The statutes contemplate the maintenance of this great public work in the District, its continuance, and appropriation therefor. The institution itself is made subject to the visitation, inspection, and control of the Secretary of the Interior. In the face of all this, objection has been made there were no statutes authorizing the expenditure in this university and that there was no continuance of appropriation for a public work and object that is already in progress. Stranger still, these statutes are not recited in the Book of Estimates, although they are found in the public Compiled Statutes (p. 1278) and in the supplement (p. 384). Stranger still, this does not seem to be known to any member of the Appropriations Committee; and on this objection the paragraph was allowed to go out by default.

DISCONTINUANCE OF APPROPRIATION A GREAT PUBLIC CALAMITY.

It is in a way material to the point of order that the discontinuance of this appropriation would be a great public calamity; it is only such a calamity because it is the discontinuance of a great public work. I print, as an appendix, an editorial in a Washington newspaper of to-day which shows how this matter is regarded by the public:

[From the Washington Times, Saturday, Feb. 13, 1915.]

HOWARD UNIVERSITY.

Closing the doors of Howard University, or seriously impairing its work, will mean a serious backward step in the development of the colored race. One or the other of these effects will be the result of the withdrawal of the annual Government allotment of $101,000 to that institution. Congressman SISSON succeeded in having the House eliminate the item by making a point of order, in the face of open protest of other southern Members.

Howard University has long been criticized for not embarking upon industrial work, similar to that of Tuskegee. Many institutions are now giving such work. Howard is the only institution of its kind in the country affording virtually the same education for the colored students that white academic colleges give white students. Moreover, Howard University has not had the funds to develop its work beyond that outlined when it was founded. But within its present scope it has grown and kept abreast of the times. No one will deny the utility of its splendid medical school, which has sent forth physicians to minister among colored persons, splendidly equipped not only for their professional task but to be leaders among their people.

Congressman SHERLEY, speaking as a southerner, questioned the wisdom of crippling Howard University. He admitted, as will many of its faculty, that an enlargement of its work would be beneficial. But the way to such a growth is not by the withdrawal of Government funds which are practically indispensable to its maintenance.

The National Capital owes a peculiar duty to the colored folk. They are here in large numbers. It was a pointed coincidence that this assault upon the only opportunity afforded here for their higher education should have been made on the birthday of the Emancipator, whose action brought them to Washington in such large numbers. Whatever its limitations in curriculum, no one will deny that Howard University, and the men associated with it, have stood for the progress and betterment of the colored race, and such leaders as Booker T. Washington have frequently testified to its radiating influence among the colored race.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the appropriations for Howard University, but it is contrary to the practice of the House to grant consent to return to a paragraph taken out of the bill upon a point of order made by a Member unless he is present when the request is made.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. That is true. I have not made the request as yet, and I want to reserve the right to make the request when the gentleman from Mississippi returns.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I would not object, and I think the gentleman from Mississippi will be here shortly.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. I certainly would like to make the request, but I thought it my duty to bring the matter to the attention of the members of the Committee on Appropriations and to the attention of the Chair as soon as I could, although deferring the making of the request until the gentleman from Mississippi returns to the Chamber may involve repeating something that I have said.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, before the Clerk reads, I move to strike out the last word. This is the item for lighthouses and lighthouse establishments, and carries an appropriation of $2,775,000. Two years ago I helped to pass through Congress a law reorganizing the Lighthouse Service, and it has been said by the department that that law resulted in a saving to the Government of in the neighborhood of a half million dollars a year. A few days ago the House passed a law reorganizing the Life-Saving and Revenue-Cutter Service and called it the Coast Guard Service. When that item of appropriation in reference to the Coast Guard Service came up in the House I stated that, based upon the figures in the bill, the new law would cost the Government $411,200 more for next year than would have been the case if the reorganization law had not passed. The gentleman from New York corrected me and stated that the exact additional expense by reason of the new law was $386,228. I find upon examination that we were both in error, and that the figures which I gave were not large enough; and as his figures were less than mine, he was still further away from the correct fact. The increased cost of the Coast Guard Service by reason of the reorganization is $414,028 for a year, as shown by the estimates.

The appropriation is not increased so much as that, because in making their estimate the department found that it could get along with making use of $7,800 on account of the dockage of cutters appropriation having been larger than necessary, and they could get along without using $20,000 of the appropriation under the act of 1882 as amended; but this had nothing to do with the reorganization. The reorganization of the service under the report of the estimates increased the expense by nearly half a million dollars, or $414,028, and it is an odd circumstance that in making their estimates they make the estimates for clothing allowance as follows: Clothing allowance, 1,997 surfmen, at 45 cents, $89,865. If the 45 cents were in figures with a decimal point, it would be easy to see how they might make a mistake, but as the cents are written out, it is not possible to understand how they could make a mistake, when they meant $45. Of course, clothing allowance, 45 cents to a man, would not amount to much.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman has been discussing the estimates submitted. The committee added to the amount carried in this bill last year, because of the mandatory provision of the Coast Guard bill, $386,000. If the gentleman can not find the figures in the estimates, I know it was added, because I added it.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman is again mistaken.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I am not mistaken.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman added $326,228; his figures are correct; but the estimates state in language that is explicit, "Summary of additional expense, $414,028." From this should be deducted, dockage of cutters, $7,800, and of the items $70,000 for claims arising under sections 7 and 8 of the act of May 4, 1914, is deducted $20,000, which would have been unexpended in any event, because the appropriation was too large, and it was included in one lump-sum appropriation. Perhaps the appropriation is only increased by the amount named; but the additional expense of reorganization is nearly half a million dollars, which is quite in contrast with the half a million dollars which was saved by the reorganization of the Lighthouse Service.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment of the gentleman will be considered as withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

St. Johnsbury (Vt.) station and Holden (Vt.) auxiliary station: Superintendent, $1,500; foreman, $1,200; fish-culturist, $900; skilled laborer, $720; four laborers, at $600 each; in all, $6,720.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I notice that the usual force for an ordinary fish-cultural station throughout the country seems to be a superintendent and a fish-culturist and two or more laborers. I notice that in some of these that in addition to that arrangement there is also a foreman, or, in some instances, two or more foremen, and an engineer. I would like to ask what is the difference in the requirement or system that necessitates a foreman to be appropriated for at some stations and not at others?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It all depends upon the size and character of the operations carried on. Some have small ponds, others have ponds and hatcheries combined. It depends upon the expensive character of the plant.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Fish hatchery, Louisville, Ky.: For addition to the Louisville (Ky.) fisheries station, including the construction of buildings and ponds, and for equipment, to be immediately available, $20,000.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to ask the chairman of the committee about this increase for fish hatcheries. They were established in the beginning at the amount of $25,000, and there is an increase I notice in some of them. Is that to enlarge the hatchery over the original intention?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know what the original intention was.

Mr. FOSTER. What was the amount of the first appropriation?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why, it is to provide these accessories necessary for a hatchery, to make workable and useful the hatchery. This is a combined ponds and hatchery.

Mr. FOSTER. Well, I notice on the next page there is one for Saratoga, Wyo., which is $18,000 more. Now, what I want to get at is, when we allow the amount of $25,000 for the establishment of a fish hatchery, is this an increase over the original amount or an enlargement? I mean, is it to complete what was intended to be done in the first instance or to increase the equipment?

Mr. FITZGERALD. When the original appropriation was made there was no limit of cost placed, and there was no limited plan as to what would be done. In the Louisville hatchery the State donated the ground, and the work of establishing a hatchery there was begun. It is estimated that $30,000 will be required to complete it. This bill carries $20,000 of the $30,000. Six thousand dollars is for a hatchery building, $2,000 for a hatchery equipment, then about $5,000 for four breeding ponds, and $7,000 for rearing ponds. This hatchery is so located that they have what is known as the combined hatchery—breeding ponds and hatchery buildings. Without additional facilities the plant can not be utilized in the manner which is desirable and necessary. These plants are not established as the result of some law or some special act, but they are established by items placed on appropriation bills which the House is compelled to accept in lieu of something more indefensible. It comes to a choice of evils, and these fish hatcheries, as they really accomplish some good, are a benefit to people generally, and are accepted in place of something else.

Mr. FOSTER. What I was trying to get at was that these fish hatcheries were established and were supposed to be at a limit of cost.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There never was a limit of cost.

Mr. SHERLEY. If the gentleman really desired information instead of desiring to call attention to the item because I happen to be on the committee, I will say to him that there never has been a hatchery that has been completed for $25,000, and no hatchery probably can be completed for that amount. And this item is two-thirds of the amount that was estimated by the department. The committee did not feel that it ought to allow the $30,000 they asked, and therefore cut it to $20,000. The purpose is to finish the buildings there, so as to have a complete hatchery and have complete breeding ponds for the purpose for which the hatchery was originally established.

Mr. FOSTER. I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky that I did not have a desire to talk about the one at Louisville, Ky., especially; but I wish to know that if the $25,000 is appropriated, it means the station is to be completed for $25,000?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] has expired.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that his time be extended for one minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOSTER. Or whether that means the beginning and then any amount that Congress sees fit to appropriate in order to complete the station?

Mr. SHERLEY. I can only answer the gentleman by saying that in every instance I now recall the hatcheries have cost over $25,000 before they were permanently equipped. Many have cost many, many times that, according to the magnitude of them. I think it is well for the House to understand that a fish hatchery can not be completed for $25,000 if it is to be a hatchery of any magnitude sufficient to warrant its establishment.

Mr. FOSTER. That is the information I desired to have from the committee, so that it might be understood at the time these fish hatcheries are established.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

I suppose I should not take advantage of the discussion that has just taken place between the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] with respect to the membership of one or the other of them upon any important committee of the House. I think any member of a committee has as much right to have his bills considered as any other member, and that we should all stand for equal rights in matters of that kind. Of course there should be no special privileges to anyone because he happens to be a member of a powerful committee.

But what interests me with respect to these fish-hatchery items is that whereas allowances are made for additions to plants, in that other very important work of making additions to buildings at arsenals, where the business of the Government is being carried on and where there is very great congestion both as to space for machinery and as to the labor facilities for the men and women who are employed there, it is very difficult—in fact, it is sometimes contrary to the policy of some large committees, like the Committee on Appropriations—to make any allowances at all. While in such cases there seems to be very great impropriety in coming in and asking for any additions or extensions which involve economy and a Government saving by reason of the waste resulting from inadequate facilities, the situation is different when it comes to fish hatcheries. Now, it may be more important to erect and to extend fish hatcheries for the purpose of propagating fish than it is to safeguard the lives of the Government's employees in the arsenals. I dispute the proposition, but the inference is drawn from the manner in which these appropriations are made. Probably $75,000 is allotted here to various fish hatcheries for the purpose of making additions and extensions. That $75,000 is intended to pay the salaries of men who are employed at these stations and to erect buildings in order that there may be more spawn and more fish on inland streams. It is all very well; we want the fish; but why should we not have erected certain very important additions to arsenals in certain sections of the country where there is sore need for more working space in order to safeguard the lives of the men and women who are employed in doing the business of the Government?

Apart from that, Mr. Chairman, it is interesting to note that while it is difficult to secure appropriations for these very needful purposes of the Government at the arsenals, we are able to make appropriations for additions and extensions at the hatcheries at a time when we might economize and thus save the administration from the pain of making up a deficit. It is also worth noting that while we can not spend money to safeguard lives and protect the property of the Government at the arsenals we are able to find money not only for the hatcheries but for the purpose of installing a cold-storage plant, apparently to preserve the fish, or fur seals, or something of that kind, in Alaska and on the Pribilof Islands. Now, this is a good thing to remember, when, in the heat and stress of a blistering summer's sun, men and women are forced to stand in the open in an arsenal and do the dangerous work of preparing the implements of war to protect the Government and at the daily risk of being blown into eternity, a part of the money that is being appropriated for hatcheries would give the arsenal workers the necessary relief and put the Government on a par with private employers in the treatment of faithful employees. I would not "carry coals to Newcastle" nor deny cold storage to Alaska. Perhaps they need it up there, but cold storage at Government expense in Alaska to preserve the fish or possibly our fur-seal skins ought not to prejudice the necessary buildings in our arsenals that would give the Federal employees proper protection against the dangers that beset them in their work.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] has just given an exhibition of as unfair and as ignorant a statement as to the facts as it is possible for any human being to give. It is unfair, because he undertakes to impute motives that he would resent if they were imputed to him and which he would not actually stand for and does not seriously mean to imply now. It is ignorant, because it shows a total lack of appreciation of the facts as they exist.

There never has been any disposition on the part of the Committee on Appropriations to deal unfairly with the arsenals of America, but not even the Treasury of the United States could keep pace with the appetite of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and whenever he is not placated to the extent of 100 per cent of his demands he feels it in order to say something about the motives of other men. He also undertakes to get facetious about an ice plant in Alaska, and talks about the absurd waste of money for such a purpose when men's health and lives are in need or in peril in Philadelphia.

Now, if he had read the RECORD and knew anything about what he was talking about, he would know that the ice plant was for the purpose of preserving food for the people of Alaska, and that it was an absolute necessity for the health of the people there; and instead of its being one of these extravagant wastes that he facetiously talks about, it was just in the interest of humanity and life that the gentleman pretends such a solicitude about. Now, touching the Louisville fish hatchery, I am glad to say this—and I am glad that the gentleman's speech has afforded me an opportunity to say it—that I have been for 12 years a Member of the House, and I have been a member of the Committee on Appropriations for more than half that time, and no instance can be found where I have in any way sought to use my committee position for the special benefit of my district or against any Member or any district. There was put into the sundry civil bill while the Republicans were in control, as the result of a provision inserted in the Senate and concurred in by the House, an item for a hatchery at Louisville, Ky. There was appropriated $25,000 for it. The State of Kentucky gave the land for the hatchery adjoining the State fair grounds, and it is situated just outside the city of Louisville, with ample rail and river facilities, and the city of Louisville has recently built a boulevard around the city that passes through the edge of this property. It is so situated that it will supply conveniently and properly a very large area of the country.

I do not believe that because I happen to be a member of the committee any favor should be shown to this hatchery. On the other hand, I do not believe there should be any discrimination against it or that there is any reason for an attack upon the item because I happen to be a member of that committee. The committee, in considering all the items which go to make up the sundry civil bill, carrying over $100,000,000, of necessity have to reject some and grant others. It is very easy for gentlemen to pick some item that they are not in sympathy with or which they do not think is important and then contrast it with some item that they are concerned in, and undertake to reflect thereby upon the judgment and the motives of the members of the committee. I am always willing and glad to have the action of the Committee on Appropriations reviewed by the House, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania ought to be the last man in the House to make complaint. It so happens that I have been responsible for a greater enlargement of the arsenals of the United States and of the work that is done in the arsenals than any other man in Congress in the last five years, and I have shown no disposition to discriminate. But I repeat that not even the Treasury of the United States is able to keep pace with the appetite of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Fur-seal islands, Alaska, cold-storage plant: For purchase and installation of a cold-storage plant on the Pribil Islands, to be immediately available, $3,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, is that word "Pribilof" Islands spelled correctly there?

The CHAIRMAN. No. Without objection, the correction will be made.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF STANDARDS.

Testing of large scales: For investigation and testing of railroad track scales, elevator scales, and other scales used in weighing commodities for interstate shipments and to secure equipment and assistance for testing the scales used by the Government in its transactions with the public, such as post office, navy yard, and customhouse scales, including personal services in the District of Columbia and in the field, $40,000.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, while I made no direct reference to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] nor to the Louisville item, so far as I recall, and had no intent to strike out the item, I did have in mind calling the attention of the committee to the fact that economy might be exercised on fishery projects, just as it is exercised upon arsenal projects.

It seems to me the comparison was fair and should not have evoked any special criticism from a member of the Committee on Appropriations. I have the highest respect for the gentleman from Kentucky, holding him to be one of the very ablest and best Members of this House. But he is human, like all other Members of this body, and he stands forcefully and heroically for those projects in which the people of his community are interested. He would be untrue to them if it were not so, and he ought to be thankful to me for having drawn attention to the hatchery matter, which has given him the opportunity to make one of the finest speeches of his career, a speech which was fired with the spirit of economy and a desire to serve the public weal. He did use the word "ignorant" in a manner that might have been regarded as offensive by one who does not love him as much as I do, but I take no exception to that, knowing how little he meant to apply that term to me, and knowing that when he comes to think it over and kneels him down by the side of his little bed to-night to ask forgiveness of his Creator for all his sins he will take it back. I think I know him well enough to say that I do not misjudge him in that regard.

However, Mr. Chairman, while we are discussing the matter of economy, desiring to save money by not erecting too many additions to arsenals and not maintaining the same policy toward the hatcheries, it seems to me we might call attention to one or two of these duplications of Government work that crop up occasionally in a bill of this kind. Here we have the Bureau of Standards, with an appropriation of $40,000 for the investigation and testing of railroad track scales, elevator scales, and certain other things.

In this connection it seems to me that the Bureau of Standards, a very important branch of the Government service, has been neglected, so far as its usefulness is concerned. The large committees of the House have not observed its usefulness with that care which they apply to appropriations intended to develop arsenals and to safeguard the lives of those who are employed therein.

What is the purpose of the Bureau of Standards? It is to do the work of ascertaining weights, measures, values, fixing standards, and so forth, for which we are constantly making appropriations to other departments, as, for instance, with respect to cotton and grain. We make separate appropriations to test, and fix standards for cotton and for grain. If we are going to economize, why have three or four branches of the Government service to do this one line of work? The Bureau of Standards was intended for that purpose. In the bill making appropriations to the Department of Agriculture, which passed the House a couple of weeks ago, we added to the general confusion on this subject. We provided a $5,000 appropriation to test and establish standards for naval stores. Now, when we are economizing with regard to fish hatcheries, and particularly with regard to the arsenals of the country, why do we not also economize with respect to the Bureau of Standards and draw in some of these various and extraneous avenues of employment for Government officials and concentrate the work where it ought to be, with the Bureau of Standards?

I do not know whether I will get a rise out of the gentleman from Kentucky for making this inquiry or not.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. KONOP having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 17168. An act to authorize the North Alabama Traction Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Tennessee River at or near Decatur, Ala.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the reports of the committees of conferences on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to bills of the following titles:

H. R. 19545. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war; and

H. R. 20562. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR.

IMMIGRATION SERVICE.

For enforcement of the laws regulating immigration of aliens into the United States, including the contract-labor laws; cost of the reports of decisions of the Federal courts, and digests thereof, for the use of the Commissioner General of Immigration; salaries and expenses of all officers, clerks, and employees appointed to enforce said laws, including per diem in lieu of subsistence when allowed pursuant to section 13 of the sundry civil appropriation act approved August 1, 1914; enforcement of the provisions of the act of February 20, 1907, entitled "An act to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States," and acts amendatory thereof; necessary supplies, including exchange of typewriting machines, alterations, and repairs, and for all other expenses authorized by said act; preventing the unlawful entry of Chinese into the United States, by the appointment of suitable officers to enforce the laws in relation thereto; expenses of returning to China all Chinese persons found to be unlawfully in the United States, including the cost of imprisonment and actual expense of conveyance of Chinese persons to the frontier or seaboard for deportation; refunding of head tax upon presentation of evidence showing conclusively that collection was made through error of Government officers; and including not exceeding $2,000 for operation, maintenance, and repair of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles; all to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of Labor, $2,450,000.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The Committee on Immigration and Naturalization frequently has before it questions relating to the deportation of Chinese who are unlawfully in this country. Here is an appropriation of $2,450,000 for the general purposes of the Immigration Service, which include—preventing the unlawful entry of Chinese into the United States by the appointment of suitable officers to enforce the laws in relation thereto; expenses of returning to China all Chinese persons found to be unlawfully in the United States, including the cost of imprisonment and actual expense of conveyance of Chinese persons to the frontier or seaboard for deportation.

It would appear from that, and from the general powers conferred upon the Department of Labor and the Immigration Service, that about all the department desires for the treatment of the Chinese in the United States, including their immigration hither and their deportation from this country, is provided for; that is to say, we make an appropriation equal to all their requirements, or all their demands, and to cover this specific service.

Complaints are constantly made to the committee with respect to Chinese, and a number of bills are now under consideration looking to the further deportation of Chinese, to the registration of such Chinese as are in the country, and to the broader question of exclusion. There are some who would like to exclude all Chinese absolutely from the United States. But it would seem, as I say, that in appropriating $2,450,000 we appropriate about all the money that the Department of Labor desires for the purpose of dealing with this question. Yet in the act approved August 23, 1912, to create the Commission on Industrial Relations, which came to this House for an appropriation a few days ago, we find that a part of its province—I will not say its duties, because it was without any particular responsibility, but a part of the work which it has taken to itself—was to inquire into the scope, methods, and resources of existing bureaus of labor and into possible ways of increasing their usefulness; into the question of—smuggling or other illegal entry of Asiatics into the United States or its insular possessions, and of the methods by which such Asiatics have gained and are gaining said admission, and shall report to Congress as speedily as possible, with such recommendations as said commission may think proper to prevent such smuggling and illegal entry.

With respect to the Bureau of Standards, a moment ago I raised a question as to the duplication of Government work and the duplication of expenditure for Government work in these times of economy. It would appear that we have just appropriated $100,000 for the Industrial Relations Commission to do the exact work that has already been conferred upon the Department of Labor in the Immigration Service. It may be that the Industrial Relations Commission will stir up something or learn of some conditions somewhere of which the Department of Labor itself does not have knowledge. But so far as all we know in the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, the Department of Labor is as fully informed upon this subject of the Chinese, and the existing Immigration Service is as fully informed as if there were a thousand industrial relations commissions going over the country at the expense of $500,000 for three years. The Department of Labor is in charge of this work, and yet we are called upon to make an additional appropriation of $100,000 to give a handful of men the opportunity to travel over this country, making an investigation at the public expense of questions upon which the Government officials are already fully informed. While we are discussing economy, it would seem that we might also consider this palpable duplication of public work.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to inquire of the gentleman in charge of the bill why it is that they have not given the department the amount of money asked for for this service? I notice that last year the department used $2,649,500, and that the appropriation this year is $2,450,000. I would like to know why there is less appropriated this year than last?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The department will not expend within $300,000 of the appropriation this year, and there is no prospect that conditions will so change in the next year that there will be any larger immigration. The European war has curtailed immigration to this country to such an extent that the department is furloughing its employees in very large numbers, and the committee were of the opinion that there was no prospect that there would be any change in the next year, and so the recommendation was reduced about $200,000. That gives them a margin of $100,000.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Is it not true that on our northern and southern borders a larger force is required to keep immigrants out than there was last year?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They are using more persons there, but even under these circumstances they will not expend within $300,000 of the amount of the appropriation, and the committee recommends $200,000 less than last year, so that leaves them a leeway of $100,000.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Is it intended to abolish the immigration stations?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no; but the number of immigrants determines to a considerable extent the size of the force. For instance, at New York the number of immigrants arriving has fallen off to practically nothing, so that the large force over there is being discharged or detailed in other places because they can not use all the employees. It is caused by existing conditions. If the conditions should change and there should be a large influx of immigrants, the department would have to have more money, and the committee would be prepared to give it to them.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. As I understand, the record shows that there are 60 to 70 per cent less immigrants coming in since the war began.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The falling off is very large.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. But that does not interfere with the Naturalization Bureau?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; we have increased the appropriation for naturalization $25,000.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. The committee is of the opinion that the Naturalization Bureau should be given sufficient money so that they can do the work thoroughly?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; we did not give all that they asked for, but we have given an increase of $25,000, which is an increase of 10 per cent.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. An increase over the amount given last year?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; and every year we have given an increase for that work.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Recognizing that it is a valuable work?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; within reason such appropriations made as will enable them to be continued properly.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, if my time has not expired, I would like to have the letter which I send to the Clerk's desk read in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the letter will be read.

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., February 9, 1915.

Hon. GEORGE R. SMITH,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR JUDGE: As you know, I am not in the habit of writing letters to Congressmen regarding pending legislation, but I want to make an exception this time in respect to the present naturalization service established by Congress June 29, 1906. This service is a wonderful improvement from what it was under the old law and is getting more valuable every day. Applicants for citizenship are commencing to realize that the privilege of being an American citizen means something.

The service in Minnesota, under the direction of Mr. Robert S. Coleman, chief naturalization examiner, St. Paul, is extremely efficient and should by all means be continued.

I have been informed that in the sundry civil appropriation bill the committee in Congress has seen fit to cut the appropriation from that requested by the department and that this matter will be up for action in the House during the present week. I have been credibly informed that the request for the appropriation was cut to the bone by the department under direction of President Wilson and that any further cut, such as is contemplated by the committee, will interfere seriously with the service now instituted. I hope you can agree with this view and that you will be able to give us your help in seeing that the efficiency of this valuable department of the Government is not crippled for lack of funds. Citizenship is beginning to mean something more than it did years ago, when they were herded in at campaign time and rushed through at the expense of some campaign committee, and I feel that any attempt to cripple the department at this time can only be a step backward.

Yours, sincerely,

P. S. NEILSON.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, of course that letter was written at the instance of somebody in the Bureau of Naturalization. The man that wrote it does not know what is going on and does not know what he is talking about. Whoever sent it ought to be censured.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. It was not sent from the department. It was sent by the clerk of the district court in Minneapolis.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; but the department wrote out there asking him to send the letter. They ought to stop it, and they ought to mind their own business. The gentleman says that he is reliably informed that the request for the appropriation was cut to the bone. He gets his information from the Bureau of Naturalization, who wanted to get more money than they ought to have. Instead of the estimate being cut to the bone, we gave them 10 per cent more than they had last year.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Can the gentleman tell us how many Chinese were deported last year?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I shall have to look that up.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. How much was the cost of deporting them last year?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I shall have to look that up also.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Perhaps the gentleman can tell us, when Chinese come across the line from Mexico or Canada, are they merely sent back into those countries or are they sent back to China?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They must be sent back to the country from which they came.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Sent back to Canada or Mexico. Suppose some steamship company brings then into the country, is there not a law compelling the steamship company to deport them, to take them back without expense to the Government?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes. They are compelled to take them back at their own expense and also to reimburse the Government for the cost of subsistence while in the custody of the Government.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. What was the sum used for the deportation of Chinese?

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is a consolidated appropriation. Some years ago we segregated the appropriation for Chinese exclusion, but a controversy arose because the entire fund was not expended every year. Then the Immigration Service requested Congress to consolidate the $500,000 for Chinese exclusion with the general appropriation. They said that frequently an immigration inspector at some particular place could very readily be assigned to a Chinese case, whereas if we maintained a force exclusively for Chinese exclusion, it did not permit as effective a force as if the force could be used for that purpose, and for that reason the Chinese exclusion service was consolidated with the general appropriation, so that the department can use all the employees that are necessary under this appropriation for Chinese work.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Is the immigration from China increasing or diminishing?

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is very little Chinese immigration except those smuggled in. That is a profitable business, for it is worth $500 to $1,000 to smuggle a Chinaman into the country, and that is as good as gold bricks.

The Clerk read as follows:

NATURALIZATION SERVICE.

For compensation, to be fixed by the Secretary of Labor, of examiners, interpreters, clerks, and stenographers, for the purpose of carrying on the work of the Bureau of Naturalization, provided for by the act approved June 29, 1906, as amended by the act approved March 4, 1913 (Stats, L., vol. 37, p 736), and for their actual necessary traveling expenses while absent from their official stations, including street car fare on official business at official stations, together with per diem in lieu of subsistence, when allowed pursuant to section 13 of the sundry civil appropriation act approved August 1, 1914, and for such per diem, together with actual necessary traveling expenses of officers and employees of the Bureau of Naturalization in Washington while absent on official duty outside of the District of Columbia; telegrams, verifications of legal papers, telephone service in offices outside of the District of Columbia; not to exceed $5,300 for rent of offices outside of the District of Columbia where suitable quarters can not be obtained in public buildings; carrying into effect section 13 of the act of June 29, 1906 (34 Stats, p. 600), as amended by the act approved June 25, 1910, including an allowance to the clerk of the supreme court for Bronx County, N. Y., for clerical assistance, to be made in the discretion of the Secretary of Labor for the fiscal year 1915; the expenditures from this appropriation shall be made in the manner and under such regulations as the Secretary of Labor may prescribe, $275,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike all of the language after the word "ten," in line 12, page 151, down to the end of line 15.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 151, by striking out all after the word "ten," in line 12, down to and including line 15.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That language was inserted last year because a whole year had not elapsed and no allowance could be made for the county of Bronx, but it will not be necessary to continue it any longer.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE. What is the condition in Bronx County now with regard to naturalization?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Bronx County was created only last year—on the 1st of January.

Mr. CALDER. The 1st of January, 1914.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The allowances to clerks of courts are based upon the receipts for the previous year, and it would have been impossible for the department to make a proper allowance on the half year's business, so that to enable the department to make a proper allowance for the current year this authority was given in the current law, but for next year they will have a whole year's work on which to make the calculation.

Mr. MOORE. In view of what the gentleman said a moment ago about the letter that was handed up by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SMITH], I think it is fair to say that the Bureau of Naturalization has been very busy this past year.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is true; but those letters are stimulated by the bureau, and the bureau should not do it.

Mr. MOORE. That may be; but they have taken a very deep interest in their work, and I think it is fair to say that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is all very well; but I am opposed to, and I condemn whenever it comes to my observation, the action of officials in the departments of the Government at Washington in sending letters to persons throughout the country to get them to write to Members of Congress to try and induce them to increase appropriations, making statements about the action of the Committee on Appropriations which are not true.

Mr. MOORE. I think the gentleman takes a proper committee stand on that question.

Mr. FITZGERALD. As a matter of fact, in 1910, $125,000 was appropriated for this service; in 1911, $150,000; in 1912, $175,000; in 1913, $200,000; in 1914, $225,000; in 1915, $250,000; and for the next year, $275,000. Because the committee did not recommend $307,000 instead of $275,000 these letters have been sent out. If these clerks who are sending this information or misinformation to the clerks of the various courts throughout the country devoted their time to the work of the bureau, they would not be behind.

Mr. MOORE. As to Bronx County, I understand the congestion there is over. Is that the situation?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No. They will make an allowance for clerk hire up there right along.

Mr. MOORE. If the limit is reached, then the question of additional help would come up?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They can allow up to only 50 per cent of their receipts.

Mr. MOORE. I understand; on a basis of $3,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Fifty per cent.

Mr. CALDER. Fifty per cent of their total receipts for the preceding year.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. And the limit of salary taken from fees is $3,000, I think.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Formerly the clerk got a certain amount for himself.

Mr. CALDER. The clerk can now retain for himself one-half of the first $6,000. That makes $3,000 for the clerk.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The bureau makes them expend a certain amount of that for clerical service, and does not allow anything.

Mr. CALDER. Does not allow any more.

Mr. MOORE. That is the clerk of the Federal court?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The clerks of the State courts.

Mr. MOORE. There was a reason for putting this provision in the bill last year; and if I recall, it was that the clerk of the court in Bronx County——

Mr. FITZGERALD. The reason last year was this. The allowance is made on the receipts for the preceding fiscal year. Bronx County was created on the 1st of January, 1914, so that the allowance that could have been made for 1914 would have been based on the receipts for six months, and from the amount of work that was being done there, it would not enable the bureau to give as much assistance as it was believed was necessary, so that this permission was granted the bureau to give a larger allowance for this year than one-half of the receipts of the previous year, because those receipts were based upon a six-months' business.

Mr. MOORE. The whole question, then, is relegated to the department, so far as additional help is concerned?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Bronx County will now be in the same situation as any other county.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman understands, of course, that in view of the renewed interest in naturalization, and the activity of the bureau, it would be necessary to make other provisions of this kind if we were to continue it with regard to Bronx County. I am seeking information along that line.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Bronx County will get an allowance, under the law, the same as New York County or Kings County or Queens County.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the last word in line 17 be spelled correctly. The word "Labor" is spelled "Labro."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the correction will be made.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

For fuel, oil, and cotton waste, and advertising for the power plant which furnishes heat and light for the Capitol and congressional buildings, $82,924. This and the foregoing appropriations shall be expended by the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds under the supervision and direction of the commission in control of the House Office Building, appointed under the act approved March 4, 1907, and without reference to section 4 of the act approved June 17, 1910, concerning purchases for executive departments.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as a new paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 153, after line 18, insert a new paragraph as follows:

"Panama-Pacific International Exposition. The appropriation of $30,000 made in the sundry civil appropriation act for the fiscal year 1915 for the copyright and patent branch office at the Panama-Pacific International Exposition is continued and made available for expenditure during the first half of the fiscal year 1916."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE.

PUBLIC PRINTING AND BINDING.

Office of Public Printer: Public Printer, $5,500; purchasing agent, $3,600; chief clerk, $2,500; accountant, $2,500; assistant purchasing agent, $2,500; cashier and paymaster, $2,500; clerk in charge of CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at the Capitol, $2,500; private secretary, $2,500 (now being paid from "Printing and binding"); assistant accountant, $2,250; chief timekeeper, $2,000; paying teller, $2,000; clerks—2 at $2,000 each, 7 of class 4, 13 of class 3, 8 of class 2, 5 of class 1, 10 at $1,000 each, 14 at $900 each, 1 $840; paymaster's guard, $1,000; doorkeepers—chief $1,200, 1 $1,200, 6 assistants at $1,000 each; messengers—2 at $840 each; delivery men—chief $1,200, 5 at $950 each; telephone switchboard operator, $720; 3 assistant telephone switchboard operators, at $600 each; 6 messenger boys, at $420 each; in all, $130,460.

Mr. HINEBAUGH. Mr. Chairman, the bill making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government carries in its appropriation for the Department of Justice an item of $300,000 for the enforcement of the antitrust laws, the total amount appropriated for the department for 1915 being $1,229,580.

The farmers and stock raisers of Illinois and Iowa and other States are interested in knowing what use the Attorney General will make of this item of $300,000, which is appropriated for the purpose of enabling him to enforce the antitrust laws.

That the antitrust laws have been and are now being violated shamelessly by the men who control the live-stock markets has been amply shown by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] and other Members of this House.

On the 29th of January the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] introduced the following resolution:

Resolution 715.

Whereas the foreign and domestic price of fresh beef and pork has been advancing during the past six months; and

Whereas such advance would naturally warrant an increase in the price paid for fat cattle and hogs at the stockyards of the country; and

Whereas the domestic price of wheat and other cereals, the sale of which is not controlled by powerful interests in this country, has advanced to the farmer in proportion to the advanced price commanded therefor in our home and foreign markets; and

Whereas the average price of fat cattle at the various live-stock markets in the United States has declined more than $1.20 per hundred during the past six months, and the price of fat hogs at such markets during that period has declined more than $2.20 per hundred, and to a point where the actual cost to our farmers and stock raisers to produce fat cattle and hogs, considering the present price of corn, is in excess of the present market price of fat cattle and hogs at the principal live-stock markets of the United States; and

Whereas there has been no overproduction of cattle or hogs during the past year, nor has there been during the past six months an oversupply offered for sale at the principal stock markets of the United States; and

Whereas it is perfectly evident to anyone familiar with the situation that such live-stock markets are being manipulated and controlled by some powerful interests that are able to depress the price of fat cattle and hogs, and at the same time increase the price of pork and beef to the consumers; that said unwarrantable, unreasonable, and unconscionable depression of such prices can only be effected by an unlawful agreement or practice in restraint of trade in the live-stock industry: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Attorney General of the United States be instructed to immediately make a thorough investigation of the causes for the unreasonable depression in the price of fat cattle and hogs at the principal stock markets in the United States during the past six months, and that the Attorney General further report to Congress what action has been taken, if any, by the Department of Justice of the United States to secure the conviction of any person or persons for the violation of the antitrust laws of the United States in effecting any depression in the price paid to our farmers and cattle raisers for fat cattle and hogs sold at the principal stock markets of the United States, and if the Attorney General shall find that there has been no violation of the Federal antitrust laws in depressing the price of fat cattle and hogs in such markets, that he report to Congress what additional legislation, in his opinion, is necessary to prevent the recurrence of the intolerable condition herein referred to.

This resolution calls upon the Attorney General to immediately make a thorough investigation of the causes of the unreasonable depression in the price of fat cattle and hogs in the principal stock markets of the country while the price of the finished product, fresh beef and pork, is steadily advancing to the consumer.

This administration has the opportunity of its life to prove that it means business in the enforcement of the laws to punish men for price fixing and illegal combinations, organized for the purpose of controlling the price of food supplies.

On January 1, 1914, the farmers of Illinois owned 1,017,000 milch cows valued at $59,189,000 and 1,216,000 other cattle valued at $43,654,000, or a total of 2,233,000 head valued at $102,843,000. Illinois farmers also owned at that time 4,358,000 head of hogs valued at $47,066,000.

Since the first of December the farmers of Illinois have suffered approximately 48 per cent of the total loss of the Nation on account of the foot-and-mouth disease. Surely, under these conditions they should be entitled to the protection of their Government against unlawful manipulation of the prices of their stock.

The farmers of Illinois feed approximately 85 per cent of their corn to their stock in maturing it. They must therefore look to the profits on stock sold for whatever earnings are to accrue. The answer does not lie in the statement that Illinois farmers should sell their corn and stop growing stock. The Department of Agriculture's table of corn cost shows that the price paid for fat cattle and hogs in Illinois does not cover the corn cost of their production, and yet fresh meats are sailing skyward.

Good farms in Illinois sell for $200 per acre or $32,000 for 160 acres. Add to this at least $3,000 for teams, stock, and farm machinery—making a total of $35,000—the interest on this amount at 5 per cent is $1,750. In addition to that the farmer must pay his running and living expenses. How much money will he have left to pay on his principal indebtedness?

The large sum of money required for the purchase of a farm in Illinois and the slight prospect of ever obtaining it is very discouraging to the average farm boy.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, the farmers of my State and of the Nation are entitled to the active and most energetic service of the department in bringing to justice the financial manipulators responsible for the outrage now being perpetrated against them.

There are 6,000,000 heads of families engaged in the farming business—representing approximately 30,000,000 people, or nearly one-third of our population. They are the food and wealth producers of the Nation and should not be dependent upon or subjected to the criminal operations of a class of men who manipulate the stock markets and food supply for personal gain.

Let this administration show its good faith by running down and driving out of existence this gang of high pirates who choose to add to their dishonest millions more dishonest dollars at the expense of the consumers and producers of the country.

The farmers of Illinois tried to kill the Grain Elevator Trust that for many years controlled the price of grain by going into the elevator business.

Farmers should be entitled to the fair profits on their grain and stock which legitimate demand and supply will create, unhampered by men who desire to grow rich by unlawful price juggling.

On March 3, 1914, in the hearing which was held before the Rules Committee of the House on grain exchanges, a Mr. Drake testified that the grain gamblers of the Minneapolis exchange could depress the market one-half cent by sending in selling orders for 50,000 bushels of wheat, and that the whole amount of the future transactions of these men totaled the enormous sum of $10,000,000,000 each year. In other words, for every bushel of real wheat more than 50 bushels of phantom wheat was sold, and every bushel of future grain sold tended to fix the price received for cash grain.

On page 159 of the hearings above referred to appears the statement that the Board of Trade of Chicago practically controls the Illinois Legislature and the Illinois courts, and that the farmers and shippers of Illinois are powerless. On page 78 of the hearings a written statement by Mr. Greeley was submitted to the committee, which, among other things, contains this language:

Is it to be believed that Congress will not continue to discuss legislation hostile to so-called "legitimate speculation," when the Chicago public warehouse monopoly stands equipped with a passive governor, attorney general, State attorney, railroad and warehouse commission, board of trade directory, board of trade membership, board of trade clearing house, Illinois inspection department, warehouse receipts, possibly free elevators and banking assistance, with an army of so termed "suckers" furnished by an endless system of private wires and blackboard quotations, together with millions of grain raisers scattered in almost every town and hamlet in the country from which to secure dividends? Is any Congress free from censure which will not try to land such a conspiracy in restraint of trade, and will it not be justified in placing such conspirators behind the bars if the commerce so affected is interstate? Is trade in cash grain to suffer because of the lack of honest efforts to eliminate rascality?

Mr. Chairman, in my judgment, this language might well be applied to the men who are now controlling, regardless of the law of supply and demand, the live-stock markets of the country by reason of their vicious and unlawful manipulation of prices. The consumer is required to pay ever-advancing prices for fresh meats, while the farmers and producers are required to sell in a market which does not reflect a proportionate advance.

Who says that fat hogs on February 3, 1914, shall be $8.55 per hundred and on February 2, 1915, $6.85 per hundred in the Chicago market? Who sets the price for this live stock? Does the farmer? Indeed, he does not. The price, as every farmer knows, is fixed by these men who control the live-stock markets of the country, acting in concert and overriding the economic law of supply and demand.

The corn crop of Illinois for the year 1913 was, in round numbers, 282,000,000 bushels. The 1914 crop of the State of Illinois is estimated, in round numbers, at 300,000,000 bushels. The price of the corn which Illinois farmers fed their stock in 1914 was 66 cents on the Chicago market, whereas cash corn on the Chicago market in February, 1915, sold at 79¾ cents a bushel, making a difference of 13¾ cents a bushel on every bushel of corn fed by Illinois farmers in maturing their cattle and hogs.

It does not require an expert mathematician to demonstrate that Illinois farmers who feed their corn to cattle and hogs have lost many millions of dollars by so doing.

In February, 1914, an Illinois farmer received 66 cents a bushel for his corn in the Chicago market and $8.55 per hundred for his hogs. In February, 1915, the same Illinois farmer could get 79¾ cents for his corn and only $6.85 per hundred for his hogs, while at the same time good native steer carcasses and dressed hogs were selling to the consumer at a cent and a half a pound more than they were a year ago.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that the Anderson resolution should be adopted forthwith by this House and the Attorney General instructed to investigate the live-stock markets of the country and prosecute criminally all offenders against the antitrust laws.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words, in order to ask a question. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee what provision is made for the medical director at the Government Printing Office?

Mr. FITZGERALD. He is paid out of a lump appropriation.

Mr. BARNHART. Now, Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment, in line 21, page 153, after the word "Printer," to strike out the figures "$5,500" and insert instead "$6,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 153, line 21, strike out "$5,500" and insert "$6,000."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order.

Mr. BARNHART. Will the gentleman please reserve the point of order for just a moment?

Mr. GILLETT. All right; I withdraw my point of order temporarily.

Mr. BARNHART. Mr. Chairman, after much investigation and extensive hearings the Committee on Printing and the Joint Committee on Printing unanimously decided that it would be well to increase the salary of the Government Printer from $5,500 to $6,000 and to reduce the salary of the Deputy Public Printer from $4,500 to $4,000. That would harmonize exactly with the salaries paid in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing. It seemed to the committee which had these hearings and which went into the investigation that a readjustment of those salaries was necessary. The salary of the Deputy Public Printer was increased from $3,600 to $4,500 some years ago, when there was a series of disturbances in the Government Printing Office, whereby, as I recall, there were about four different Public Printers appointed and discharged within the period of some 16 or 17 months. The Deputy Public Printer must necessarily be a man of considerable accomplishment; and yet, Mr. Chairman, his salary is so much more than other deputies in offices of the Government, and the salary of the Government Printer is so much lower than the salaries of other Government officials with like responsibilities, that the new printing bill, which passed this House without a dissenting vote, carried a provision that this readjustment of salaries should be made. Now, if a point of order is not made against this amendment to increase the salary of the Government Printer $500, I shall then offer another amendment providing that the salary of the Deputy Public Printer shall be reduced $500, which will leave the appropriation as it is and adjust the salaries so that I think it will be more generally satisfactory and more in harmony with the eternal fitness of things.

The CHAIRMAN. Is a point of order made against the amendment?

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order.

Mr. GILLETT. I make the point of order. The gentleman from New York reserved the point of order, and I supposed he was going to make it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, of course, sustains the point of order, as it changes existing law.

The Clerk read as follows:

For public printing, public binding, and paper for public printing and binding, including the cost of printing the debates and proceedings of Congress in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and for lithographing, mapping, and engraving, for both Houses of Congress, the Supreme Court of the United States, the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, the Court of Claims, the Library of Congress, the Smithsonian Institution, the Interstate Commerce Commission, the International Bureau of American Republics, the Executive Office, and the departments; for salaries, compensation, or wages of all necessary employees additional to those herein specifically appropriated for, including the compensation of the foreman of binding and the foreman of printing; rents, fuel, gas, electric current, gas and electric fixtures; bicycles, electrical vehicles for the carriage of printing and printing supplies, and the maintenance, repair, and operation of the same, to be used only for official purposes, including the maintenance, repair, and operation of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles for official use of the officers of the Government Printing Office when in writing ordered by the Public Printer (not exceeding $1,500); freight, expressage, telegraph and telephone service; furniture, typewriters, and carpets; traveling expenses, stationery, postage, and advertising; directories, technical books, and books of reference, not stamps, and other machines of similar character; machinery (not exceeding $100,000); equipment, and for repairs to machinery, implements, and buildings, and for minor alterations to buildings; necessary equipment, maintenance, and supplies for the emergency room for the use of all employees in the Government Printing Office who may be taken suddenly ill or receive injury while on duty; other necessary contingent and miscellaneous items authorized by the Public Printer; and for all the necessary materials and equipment needed in the prosecution and delivery and mailing of the work, $4,400,000.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 155, line 8, after the word "Commission," insert the words "the Federal Trade Commission."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I see the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] is now in the Chamber, and I desire to ask——

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I think we had better finish the bill first.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. All right, at any time.

The Clerk read as follows:

For printing and binding for Congress, including the proceedings and debates, $1,587,520. Printing and binding for Congress chargeable to this appropriation, when recommended to be done by the Committee on Printing of either House, shall be so recommended in a report containing an approximate estimate of the cost thereof, together with a statement from the Public Printer of estimated approximate cost of work previously ordered by Congress, within the fiscal year for which this appropriation is made.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, we are now reading the printing item, and one of the items is that for printing for the Interstate Commerce Commission, and that reminds me of a recent decision of the commission which is of very great importance to the people of the intermountain West. I am not given to recklessly criticizing judicial bodies or decisions. I am not chargeable with any fault in that regard, and I do not want to be understood now as unreservedly criticizing the decision to which I shall refer, and yet I profoundly regret it. I am not convinced that it is based on equity or that it is fair to the people of the intermountain country. I do not believe it is. The decision to which I refer is one handed down a few days ago by the Interstate Commerce Commission, authorizing the transcontinental railroads to grant shippers from Chicago and points eastward reduced rates on shipments through to the Pacific coast, without at the same time reducing in the same proportion their rates to intermountain points. Now, the intermountain country already suffers from a great many handicaps. It is a handicap to be 1,500 miles from tidewater or from any navigation by water. It is a handicap to be in a country where nature is not as kindly as she is in some other localities. If a community is handicapped somewhat by nature and locality, it certainly should not be further handicapped by those agencies which are established for the purpose of establishing and maintaining transportation conditions that are fair, equitable, and just. The Interstate Commerce Commission bases its decision in this case upon the necessity, as the commission sees it, of reducing the rate between eastern points and Pacific points in order to enable the railroads to compete with the Panama Canal. Now, we of the intermountain West were in favor of building the Panama Canal, and we have done our share to help pay for it, but I do not think that the building of that great waterway should be made the vehicle and means of adding to our burdens. The commission justifies its action by saying that the rates they now make will cover all of the actual outlay, and therefore they are justified in making those rates——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, in order that gentlemen may understand the tenor and effect of this decision, I shall place in the RECORD a clipping from the Washington Star of day before yesterday, as follows:

LOWER RATES DUE TO CANAL TRAFFIC—TRANSCONTINENTAL CARRIERS PERMITTED TO ESTABLISH NEW TARIFFS TO PACIFIC—EXPLANATION OF ORDER IS GIVEN BY THE INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION—RAILROADS WOULD BE UNABLE TO COMPETE WITH WATER LINES—LOWER THAN TO INTERMEDIATE POINTS.

To meet new traffic conditions which have arisen with the opening of the Panama Canal, the Interstate Commerce Commission to-day permitted transcontinental railroads to establish certain commodity rates from eastern points to Pacific coast terminals lower than those to intermediate points in intermountain territory.

This explanation of the order, which brings into prominent notice the revolutionary effect of the Panama Canal on transcontinental transportation, was made at the commission's headquarters.

"Under the original order in the intermountain case, carriers were required from the Missouri River westward not to charge more to an intermountain point than to a Pacific terminal. East of the river the stringency of the rule was somewhat abated.

"From Chicago to intermountain points the excess charge permitted over the rate to the Pacific terminals was 7 per cent; from Pittsburgh, 15 per cent; from the Atlantic seaboard, 25 per cent.

EFFECT OF SHRINKAGE IN RATES.

"The shrinkage of rates via the canal from New York to San Francisco put the transcontinental carriers in serious straits. On certain heavy commodities, largely moving by water, if the carriers reduced their rates to the Pacific to compete with the lowered water rates, a serious shrinkage in through earnings was inevitable. In addition to this loss on through revenue the carriers would have had to take a double loss on revenue to the intermountain points: First, because the intermountain rates would have to be lowered; and, second, because the percentage over the terminal rates would have been calculated on a lower base.

"Had no additional relief been afforded on intermountain points, an abandonment of much rail carriage from the Atlantic-seaboard territory was imminent, and had additional relief on intermountain traffic not been granted, there was grave reason to think that the Atlantic seaboard in the future would have supplied, by water, the Pacific coast with the commodities in question, and that many industries in the neighborhood of Chicago would have either lost their Pacific customers or have been compelled to migrate to near the Atlantic seaboard.

"In this emergency a greater degree of relief on certain commodities to intermountain points has been accorded by the commission, but only on the commodities in question. The net result of the greater relief is that industries in the Chicago and middle-west section will continue in the business of supplying consumers on the Pacific."

CHANGES IN THE RATES.

The order permits railroads to carry carload freight from Chicago, Buffalo, and New York to intermediate points, 15, 25, and 35 cents higher than from the Missouri River to the same destination, and less-than-carload commodity rates from Chicago, Pittsburgh, and New York to intermediate points may exceed those from the Missouri River to the same destinations by 25, 40, and 55 cents, respectively.

Carload rates on coal and pig iron may be less to the Pacific coast than to intermediate points, but the rates on such articles to the higher rates intermediate points must not exceed 5 mills per ton-mile.

"The Pacific coast terminals to which these rates will apply," says the explanation, "are the points at which the Atlantic-Pacific steamships deliver their freight."

"It is evident from the whole record," says the commission's opinion, "that whatever may have been the degree of competition in the past between the rail carriers and the water carriers as to the rates on these articles, concerning which additional relief is now sought, we are witnessing the beginning of a new era in transportation between the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts.

RATES MUST BE LOWER.

"To secure any considerable percentage of this coast-to-coast traffic rates on many commodities must be established by the rail lines materially lower than those now existing. As we view it, the Panama Canal is to be one of the agencies of transportation between the East and the West, but not necessarily the sole carrier. If the railroads are able to make such rates from the Atlantic seaboard to the Pacific coast as will hold to their lines some portion of this traffic with profit to themselves, they should be permitted to do so.

"The acceptance of this traffic will add something to their net revenues, and to that extent decrease, and not increase, the burden that must be borne by other traffic. It will also give the shippers at the coast points the benefits of an additional and a competitive service.

"We are of the opinion that these carriers should be permitted to compete for this long-distance traffic so long as it may be secured at rates which clearly cover the out-of-pocket cost."

The commission says that few, if any, of the intervening interests really opposed the petition of the carriers, but that the intermountain territory protested.

The commission suggests that the railroads themselves readjust the so-called "back-haul" rates from the Pacific coast to points inland.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, Mr. Chairman, we all know that if all railroad rates were placed so low that the rates would simply cover the actual outgo, the actual expenditure in carrying the traffic, that the roads would eventually go into bankruptcy, because there must be a fair interest made on the investment. The interest must be paid on the stocks and bonds and other obligations, and to fix a rate on the basis of simply covering and paying for the actual outlay means fixing a rate that burdens some other traffic. And in order to help the Pacific coast, having already all the benefits of tidewater communication, in order to help Chicago and eastern shippers, in order to make it possible for some railroad manager to keep up his volume of business in coast-to-coast traffic, rates are allowed to be made which in the last analysis are a burden on the people who live in the intermountain region. We not only pay for the haulage of our freight and at high rates under present conditions, but we must be further burdened, because the Panama Canal has been built, in order that some one already having the advantage of ocean transportation may have other advantages. We are to be burdened because shippers not willing to adjust themselves to changed conditions want to make us pay for the losses railways sustain in hauling their traffic. It is not fair, it is not just, it is not equitable, in my opinion, and I hope and trust that eventually, and the sooner the better, this decision will be overturned. The commission suggests that not all of those affected by the rates protested, but the intermountain region protested vigorously and protested in vain. Our situation was bad enough, heaven knows, before this last decision, for, like the darky's 'coon trap, the rates heretofore in force caught us coming and going.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. McKENZIE. The decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission has not raised the rates affecting your country, has it, or the intermountain States?

Mr. MONDELL. The decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission has not raised our rates.

Mr. McKENZIE. Then you are in no worse position than you have been heretofore?

Mr. MONDELL. We are, for this reason: That every ton of freight hauled on this new lower rate from Chicago and points farther east to the coast is hauled at a loss, and the only place where that loss can be made up is in the rates into the intermountain region. Why, we are already paying a burden with regard to that, because under decisions heretofore made shippers are allowed to charge more for hauling to the intermountain country than a thousand miles farther to the coast.

The rates to the intermountain country are high. Our people have frequently attempted to secure a reduction, but generally in vain. Not only must we prove that a certain rate is unfair and inequitable and that another and lower rate is fair and reasonable and sufficient for the service, but it must also be proven that these lower rates we seek are not unreasonably low or confiscatory when considered in connection with the income from other rates—from these low through rates. If we have had difficulty in securing reductions in the past, how much more difficult will it be to secure reductions in the future with the low, unremunerative rates extended and rendered more unremunerative by this recent order? Further, the more tonnage secured by these low rates the more the loss to the railroads. Some one must make good that loss. It will come out of the intermountain country.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for five minutes more.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much more time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. MONDELL Five minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate on the paragraph and amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that all debate on the paragraph and the amendments thereto close in five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, if we make a shipment from any eastern point into the intermountain country, we pay as much as though we lived on the coast and from 7 to 25 per cent more, and under this new rule from 15 to 35 per cent more. If we desire a shipment from the Pacific coast, in some cases we pay more on freight hauled only 1,500 miles than is paid on freight hauled clear across the continent.

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. The railroads are allowed to burden us both ways. We not only lack the benefits and advantages of water transportation, but a burden is placed upon us because other communities do have the benefits of water transportation. In order to make the benefits of water transportation more beneficial, more helpful to other communities, than they would ordinarily and naturally be, the interior is taxed in order that the shipper may have even greater advantages than his naturally advantageous location gives him.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN].

Mr. BRYAN. In view of the fact of these injustices the gentleman speaks of, does he not feel that it would be wise for him to join with me on the Government ownership of railroads, so that we can regulate these rates at Washington, the National Capital, and prevent these injustices, and have authority over them?

Mr. MONDELL. I sometimes, no doubt, get a little foolish on some things, but I hope I have not gotten foolish enough yet to imagine that you can secure better freight rates under Government ownership than you may secure under private ownership and Government supervision.

Mr. BRYAN. Does not the gentleman think it would be wise from a legislative standpoint to prevent this phony competition between the railroads and the steamboats, to allow traffic to take its natural course, and to go by water if it can——

Mr. MONDELL. The very thing I am complaining about is action by an agency of the Federal Government, and the gentleman wants more action by the Government.

Mr. BRYAN. But the gentleman is complaining in Congress, and he is acting on the part of the Federal Government.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, I do not want to enter into a controversy with the gentleman in regard to the merits and demerits of public ownership of railroads. I do not think there is an argument that any sane man ought to give consideration to in favor of Government ownership of railroads.

Mr. BRYAN. Of course I addressed the gentleman from Wyoming. I did not refer to anything about sanity.

Mr. MONDELL. I was not especially referring to the gentleman from Washington. If the gentleman from Washington wants to apply my words, of course that is his affair and not mine. But what I am complaining of is this, that this system of allowing lower rates for long haul than for the short haul, a system questionable in its wisdom and in its equity under any circumstances and conditions, as now extended by this decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission tends to lay a burden on the intermountain country, which is already burdened beyond most of the Union in the matter of freight rates. We now pay more per mile for freight coming to us than most sections of the country, and here is a decision which will eventually result in our paying still greater, considering the services performed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired. Under the order all time has expired.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, in view of the remarks just made by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL], I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by quoting extracts from the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission on the matter of commodity rates to Pacific coast terminals and intermediate points. These extracts will answer some of the gentleman's criticisms. I commend the reading of the full decision, which goes into the whole subject thoroughly.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD certain statements. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[Extracts from decision of Interstate Commerce Commission.]

COMMODITY RATES TO PACIFIC COAST TERMINALS AND INTERMEDIATE POINTS—IN THE MATTER OF APPLICATIONS FOR RELIEF FROM THE PROVISIONS OF THE FOURTH SECTION OF THE ACT TO REGULATE COMMERCE, AS AMENDED JUNE 18, 1910, WITH RESPECT TO COMMODITY RATES FROM EASTERN DEFINED TERRITORIES TO PACIFIC COAST TERMINALS AND INTERMEDIATE POINTS.

[Submitted Nov. 23, 1914. Decided Jan. 29, 1915.]

It is evident from the whole record that, whatever may have been the degree of competition in the past between the rail carriers and the water carriers as to the rates on these articles concerning which additional relief is now sought, we are witnessing the beginning of a new era in transportation between the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts. To secure any considerable percentage of this coast-to-coast traffic rates on many commodities must be established by the rail lines materially lower than those now existing.

It has been suggested that the construction of the Panama Canal by the Government of the United States is indicative of a governmental policy to secure all of this coast-to-coast business for the water lines, and that no adjustment of rates by the rail lines should be permitted which will take away traffic from the ocean carriers which normally might be carried by them. This suggestion, however, loses force under the consideration that the Panama Canal is but one of the agencies of transportation that the Government of the United States has fostered between the Atlantic coast and the Pacific. The Government has from the beginning of railroad construction in the United States encouraged their construction and operation by private capital and enterprise. Some of these transcontinental lines would not have been built had it not been for the liberality the Government extended to them at the time of their construction. As we view it, the Panama Canal is to be one of the agencies of transportation between the East and the West, but not necessarily the sole carrier of the coast-to-coast business. If the railroads are able to make such rates from the Atlantic seaboard to the Pacific coast as will hold to their lines some portion of this traffic with profit to themselves, they should be permitted so to do. The acceptance of this traffic will add something to their net revenues, and to that extent decrease, and not increase, the burden that must be borne by other traffic. It will also give the shippers at the coast points the benefits of an additional and a competitive service.

Few, if any, of these intervening interests are really opposing the petition of these carriers for relief. The intermountain territory, however, is earnestly protesting against the request of the carriers for relief as to the coast rates without adequate provision at the same time for fair, just, and reasonable rates to intermediate intermountain points.

We are of the opinion that these carriers should be permitted to compete for this long-distance traffic so long as it may be secured at rates which clearly cover the out-of-pocket cost. The lowest proposed rate from Atlantic seaboard territory is 65 cents per 100 pounds, applicable on cast and wrought iron pipe in carloads of 40,000 pounds. This gives a per car earning of $260, and upon a basis of a 3,200-mile haul yields a car-mile revenue of 8.1 cents and a ton-mile revenue of 4.05 mills. Since the average ton-mile revenue of these carriers is approximately 9 mills on freight traffic, it is probable that a rate which produces 45 per cent as much as the average pays more than the out-of-pocket cost and therefore does not impose a burden upon other traffic. None of the rates proposed appear, therefore, to be open to the charge that they pay less than the out-of-pocket cost. Many of them are low as applied to the total haul from the Atlantic seaboard, but they are not for that reason low as applied to the haul from the Missouri River. Omaha is nearly 1,500 miles west of New York City, and it is urged that rates that yield some profit over a haul of 3,200 miles must yield a good profit when the traffic is hauled but 1,800 or 1,900 miles. The Union Pacific-Southern Pacific line from Omaha to San Francisco is 1,786 miles in length. The line of the Santa Fe from Kansas City to Los Angeles is 1,809 miles; the Northern Pacific line from St. Paul to Seattle is 1,911 miles. The average haul from the Missouri River territory to the Pacific coast is approximately 1,850 miles.

* * * * * * *

These coast cities always have had, and in all probability always will have, a marked advantage over many of the interior points by reason of their geographical position on the sea and the competition of water carriers from the Atlantic coast and other points. The new situations which have resulted by reason of the building of the Panama Canal gives to these points, however, a still greater advantage that is not natural, but artificial. The United States has provided a waterway across the Isthmus that has resulted in materially decreasing the rates, shortening the time, and increasing the efficiency of the water carriers to and from the Atlantic seaboard. In so far as any reasonable and lawful relation of rates will permit, the benefits of this increased service should be extended to all of the people. It may be said also that a policy of greater liberality on the part of the rail carriers to these interior towns will result in benefit to themselves. Every carload of freight brought from the East and distributed from these interior cities instead of from the coast will effect for the carriers a saving in expense and an addition to their net revenues.

The present coast-to-coast rates of the rail lines and the problem of holding a reasonable proportion of the business to these interior points to the rail lines can only be met on the part of the carriers with rates which will afford the interior points reasonable opportunity to distribute merchandise in contiguous territory.

Will the establishment of such rates lower than the maximum amount the carriers can possibly secure for the traffic produce discrimination against points farther east to which higher rates apply? It is obvious that the low water compelled rates to the coast terminals will inevitably affect the rates to a strip of territory lying along the coast from 200 to 300 miles in width. The adoption of any scheme of rate making that will permit cities lying within this zone to more effectively compete against the coast cities may permit these interior cities to distribute merchandise a little farther east than they would under the present plan, but that apparently will not result in unjust discrimination, for the same rule will apply to all points. That is to say, the rates to all these points will be adjusted on a uniform plan, and the rates will be increased with distance from the coast until they equal the maximum rates permitted to intermountain points. For example, iron articles on which, as heretofore stated, maximum carload rates have been permitted to intermountain points of 75 cents from the Missouri River, 90 cents from Chicago, $1 from Pittsburgh, and $1.10 from New York, bear a rate from Missouri River and many points east thereof to the Pacific coast of 55 cents. Upon the assumption that proportional rates from the terminals are established on this commodity which are, for example, 25 per cent less than the local rates when traffic does not in fact move to the terminals, the rate from the Missouri River to these back-haul points would be reduced by the coast combination wherever 75 per cent of the local rate from the coast terminal to destination is less than 20 cents. The rate from Chicago to the back-haul points would be reduced in all those cases where 75 per cent of the local rate from the terminal is less than 35 cents. The rate from Pittsburgh would be reduced to all points to which 75 per cent of the rate from the terminal is less than 45 cents. Where the carload rate on some of these commodities is 75 cents or more from the Missouri River, it is applied as a maximum to intermediate points. The rates on such commodities from the Missouri River to the back-haul points are therefore unaffected by coast combination. The rates from Chicago, Pittsburgh, and New York would be affected by coast combination to only those points to which 75 per cent of the local rate from the terminal is less than 15, 25, and 35 cents, respectively.

The maximum-rate points would thus be moved a little farther east than if the full local were applied. This would widen the zone affected by the coast rates and extend the benefit of the low rates thereto to territory farther east than at present. The differences by which rates to points on the eastern side of the back-haul territory exceed the rates to points on the western side would be less marked and discrimination against the eastern points be thereby decreased. The same result could be accomplished by the publication of basing rates on these commodities from the territories of origin to the Pacific coast terminals. These basing rates, added to the local rates from the terminals, would determine the rates to back-haul points. It is obvious that there is now, and will be under any scheme of rate making that may be devised to the back-haul territory, some discrimination against points farther east in intermountain territory. This discrimination, however, under the plan suggested, does not appear to be unjust. Each interior point will be given the benefit of its geographical position and rates which apparently are not unjustly discriminatory. The extent to which carriers are hereby relieved from the operation of the rule of the fourth section by this order shall not exceed the degree of deviation permitted herein as between the terminal rates herein approved and the maximum intermediate rates herein authorized, nor shall the aforesaid degree of deviation be exceeded by any changes made in the future unless under further order of the commission.

The method of constructing the rates to the back-haul points above suggested involves necessarily reduction in the rates to such points to a level lower than the carriers have anticipated by their application. The record in this case is not sufficient to afford a basis warranting the commission in prescribing the exact measure of these rates. We shall therefore make no order in regard thereto at this time.

No evidence has been presented in this case to show that it is necessary to apply the coast terminal rates to any points except the ports of call on the Pacific coast at which the Atlantic-Pacific steamship lines deliver freight. We shall authorize these carriers to establish the rates proposed to these ports upon all the articles in the list, excepting those to which exceptions have been noted.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an analysis made by the Minneapolis Journal of the rate decision recently rendered by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a certain analysis made by the Minneapolis Journal on the recent Interstate Commerce Commission decision. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The following is the article referred to:

RAILROADS TO MEET CANAL COMPETITION WITH LOWER RATES—INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION GRANTS PERMISSION FOR CUT IN THROUGH TARIFFS—MIDDLE WEST BUSINESS TO PROFIT BY DECISION—ATLANTIC SHIPPERS THREATENED TO ACQUIRE ALL PACIFIC COAST TRADE.

WASHINGTON, February 11, 1915.

To meet new traffic conditions which have arisen with the opening of the Panama Canal the Interstate Commerce Commission to-day granted transcontinental railroads vital relief by permitting them to establish certain commodity rates from eastern points to Pacific-coast terminals lower than those to intermediate points in intermountain territory.

EARLIER ORDER CHANGED.

This explanation of the order was made at the commission's headquarters:

"Under the original order in the intermountain case carriers were required from the Missouri River westward not to charge more to an intermountain point than to a Pacific terminal. East of the river the stringency of the rule was somewhat abated.

"The shrinkage of rates via the canal from New York to San Francisco put the transcontinental carriers in serious straits. On certain heavy commodities, largely moving by water, if the carriers reduced their rates to the Pacific to compete with the lowered water rates a serious shrinkage in through earnings was inevitable.

DOUBLE LOSS A HARDSHIP.

"In addition to this loss on through revenue, the carriers would, under the original order, have had to take a double loss on revenue to the intermountain points—first because the intermountain rates would have to be lowered, and, second, because the percentages over the terminal rates would have been calculated on a lower base.

"Had no additional relief been afforded there was grave reasons to think that the Atlantic seaboard in the future would have supplied by water the Pacific coast with the commodities in question and that many industries in the neighborhood of Chicago would have either lost their Pacific customers or have been compelled to migrate to near the Atlantic seaboard. The net result of the greater relief is that industries in the Chicago and Middle West section will continue in the business of supplying customers on the Pacific."

NEW TARIFFS OUTLINED.

The order permits railroads to carry carload freight from Chicago, Buffalo, and New York to intermediate points 15, 25, and 35 cents higher than from the Missouri River to the same destinations, and less-than-carload commodity rates from Chicago, Pittsburgh, and New York to intermediate points may exceed those from the Missouri River to the same destinations by 25, 40, and 55 cents, respectively.

COAL AND IRON RATES LOWER.

Carload rates on coal and pig iron may be less to the Pacific coast than to intermediate points, but the rates on such articles to the higher-rated intermediate points must not exceed 5 mills per ton-mile.

"The Pacific coast terminals to which these rates will apply," says the explanation, "are the points at which the Atlantic-Pacific steamships deliver their freight."

CANAL CHANGES SITUATION.

"It is evident from the whole record," says the commission's opinion, "that, whatever may have been the degree of competition in the past between the rail carriers and the water carriers as to the rates on these articles, concerning which additional relief is now sought, we are witnessing the beginning of a new era of transportation between the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts.

ENTITLED TO PART OF TRAFFIC.

"To secure any considerable percentage of this coast-to-coast traffic, rates on many commodities must be established by the rail lines materially lower than those now existing. As we view it, the Panama Canal is to be one of the agencies of transportation between the East and the West, but not necessarily the sole carrier. If the railroads are able to make such rates from the Atlantic seaboard to the Pacific coast as will hold to their lines some portion of this traffic with profit to themselves, they should be permitted to do so."

The commission says that few, if any, of the intervening interests really opposed the petition of the carriers, but that the intermountain territory protested.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the Smithsonian Institution: For printing and binding the Annual Reports of the Board of Regents, with general appendixes, the editions of which shall not exceed 10,000 copies, $10,000; under the Smithsonian Institution: For the Annual Reports of the National Museum, with general appendixes, and for printing labels and blanks, and for the Bulletins and Proceedings of the National Museum, the editions of which shall not exceed 4,000 copies, and binding, in half morocco or material not more expensive, scientific books and pamphlets presented to or acquired by the National Museum Library, $37,500; for the Annual Reports and Bulletins of the Bureau of American Ethnology, and for miscellaneous printing and binding for the bureau, $21,000; for miscellaneous printing and binding for the International Exchanges, $200; the International Catalogue of Scientific Literature, $100; the National Zoological Park, $200; the Astrophysical Observatory, $200; and for the Annual Report of the American Historical Association, $7,000; in all, $76,200.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the language in lines 5 and 6, rating the editions that shall not exceed 10,000 copies. What is the result of that language?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It increases the number of copies. I think the number now is 7,500. The Committee on Printing agreed to this.

Mr. MANN. It does increase the number?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It does increase the number. It increases it by 2,500 or 3,000 copies.

Mr. MANN. I withdraw the point of order, then.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws the point of order, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That if, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, it should be to the best interests of the United States, not to exceed $50,000 of the foregoing appropriation may be expended for the erection of a building for the installation of machinery to be used in the manufacture of projectiles.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on the proviso beginning with line 8 on page 170.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman makes the point of order on the proviso, this appropriation would not be of any benefit.

Last year, in making appropriations for ammunition for seacoast-defense cannon, it was pointed out by Gen. Crozier that at the rate at which appropriations were being made $50,000 was required for certain additional facilities, and the fortification bill carried certain sums on the understanding that that matter would be taken up and included in the sundry civil appropriation bill. When the sundry civil bill was under consideration Gen. Crozier was very ill, and the matter escaped everybody's attention. It is connected with this particular item because it is in connection with this character of ammunition that this building is needed. The failure to provide these facilities will simply mean a very considerable delay in the acquisition of very necessary ammunition in connection with our seacoast defenses.

Mr. MANN. This building that is referred to in this paragraph is not a building on the Canal Zone?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, no. It is for a building at one of our arsenals; at one of the arsenals in the United States. It is not on the Canal Zone.

Mr. MANN. Upon what theory is it appropriated for here?

Mr. FITZGERALD. We pay for these tools and appliances and the like out of the appropriation for the ammunition. At first it was suggested that a separate appropriation be made for the building, but afterwards it was included in this way.

Mr. MANN. I can not understand the purpose. I supposed this was a building on the Canal Zone.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Gen. Crozier, when he appeared before the Committee on Appropriations last year, stated that if an appropriation for ammunition was made at a certain rate he would require additional facilities and would ask that $50,000 be provided for the building. He said that would be taken up on the sundry civil bill. When the sundry civil bill was reached Gen. Crozier was very ill, and the matter escaped our attention. He came before us this year and called our attention to it, and said that it could as easily be paid out of this appropriation as out of a similar appropriation in the fortifications bill, and that the facilities are necessary.

Mr. MANN. Why should it be charged to the Panama Canal?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It will not be charged to the canal.

Mr. MANN. Certainly. Here is the appropriation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; the fortification items are eliminated from the cost of the canal items.

Mr. MANN. Well, it is for the fortification of the Panama Canal.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman wishes it to go out, I have no objection.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Chairman, I would like a moment in which to give my reasons.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I might say that as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs I have joined very heartily in the plan of building up a reserve, not only of arms but of ammunition, for the protection of our country in case of an attack, and I said in that committee that I thought that one of the things that we ought to do was to provide for buildings and equip them with machinery for the manufacture especially of field and coast artillery ammunition; that it would be a better investment and would give us a better reserve than to manufacture and keep on hand such a large amount of ammunition.

I am in favor of that, but I am also in favor of constructing these additional new buildings at the Rock Island Arsenal. And I want to say that that is not because I am one of the Representatives from the State of Illinois, but because I believe that the great central arsenal of our country should be located far into the interior, and I will be glad to see it built there.

However, that is not my principal objection to the item as it now stands. My principal objection is to our giving the power to the Secretary of War to determine where this building is to be constructed or erected.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is to be constructed at the Watertown Arsenal. The reason for that is that this is the best metallurgical plant. The furnaces and parts of the plant are there already, and this is to provide some additional facilities for that plant.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him this question: If it is to be built at Watertown Arsenal, why not say so?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have no objection to saying so. There was no desire to conceal it. I say that to the gentleman so that he will have the information.

Mr. McKENZIE. With all due respect to the Secretary of War, I think it is the part of Congress to determine rather than allow him to determine where buildings shall be constructed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If we provided $50,000 for this building at the Rock Island Arsenal, it would be of no benefit, because they would have to provide a number of additional facilities that are not now at Rock Island but which are at Watertown. It would be useless to put part of the plant at Watertown, Mass., and another part of the plant at Rock Island, Ill., and then expect anybody to manufacture under any conditions.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman should remember that all of these arsenals have distributed among them a certain character of work. That has been a matter of evolution, and the Ordnance Department is infinitely better able to determine where it can do a particular kind of work than this Congress can be. As a matter of fact, Rock Island ought to complain least, because there has been more enlargement of Rock Island and there will be more enlargement there than at any other arsenal. That is due to two facts. One is that there you have unlimited power, practically, and the other is that you have land, and the other arsenals are crowded for land and have a less economic power in some cases. But they make up in other particulars, some of them by the skilled mechanics that they have available for certain types of work. But to undertake to place a building, without regard to the work that the arsenals are now doing, would simply be to waste your money.

Mr. McKENZIE. I might say to the gentleman from Kentucky that I do not consider it would be a waste of money. I think it would be well to have more of these buildings, and to have them equipped with the machinery.

Mr. SHERLEY. But this building is for a concrete purpose, and it is needed now.

Mr. McKENZIE. I understand, and my recollection is that Gen. Crozier stated before our committee, when we discussed this very question——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Your committee did not discuss this question, because it has not jurisdiction over the kind of projectiles that are to be made. These are for coast-defense guns.

Mr. GILLETT. Does the gentleman think he is as impartial a judge of what is for the best interests of the country as the Secretary of War?

Mr. McKENZIE. I will not put that up to myself.

Mr. GILLETT. I understand the reason of your objection is that it ought to go to Rock Island.

Mr. McKENZIE. If the majority of the Members of Congress felt that way, then it ought to go to Rock Island.

Mr. GILLETT. Does not the gentleman think the Secretary of War is much more apt to determine it impartially, than even the Members of this House, as to what is best for the country?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is the gentleman from Illinois going to make the point of order? If he wishes to do so, I hope he will.

Mr. McKENZIE. If you want to amend, and state where it is to be built, I might withdraw the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The department wants it at the Watertown Arsenal.

Mr. McKENZIE. If you want to put in an amendment, and submit to the House the question where is shall be built——

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman does not want it to go there, it ought not to go anywhere.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois make the point of order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is useless to provide a building at some other arsenal, when part of the plant is located there.

Mr. MADDEN. He says amend it, and put in Watertown.

Mr. McKENZIE. If you will amend it, I will withdraw the point of order. I am opposed to giving the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy such power.

Mr. FITZGERALD. After the word "building," in line 11, on page 170, I will offer an amendment to insert the words "at the Watertown Arsenal."

That is where the building is designed to be located, and that will meet the gentleman's objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that I have no objection to that amendment, but I have very serious objection to the viewpoint of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. McKENZIE] as to Congress determining these matters. If any abuse has been pronounced, it has been the abuse of individual Members of Congress undertaking to have Government plants established in their districts or their localities, not because the plant ought to be put there but because it was to the interest of a particular community. We have had constant illustrations of that kind in connection with Army posts that ought never to have been built and never would have been built if it had not been for the political power of individual men in connection with the making of appropriations for the Army. Now, to undertake to say here in Congress that we are the judges, and that we are capable judges of where various manufacturing operations should be carried on, is to say what I do not believe. I undertook to point out yesterday, in connection with the Alaskan railroad, what I believed to be the true rule. Congress, by virtue of its very size, is best able to determine questions of policy; but Congress, by virtue of its very size, is unable properly to determine matters of administration pure and simple; and for us to undertake to determine where a given thing shall be made, where the seacoast cannon shall be made, where the rifles shall be made, where the ammunition shall be made, is to undertake to determine what we are incompetent to determine and what we never would determine purely on its merits, but it would become a proposition of one section bidding against another and offsetting an appropriation for one part of the country with an appropriation for another part of the country. The trouble is that men insist on looking on these things as local when they are national. The country is interested in having the work done properly and as cheaply as it may be.

Mr. McKENZIE. I want the gentleman to understand that I do not represent the Rock Island Arsenal. It is not in my district. I have no personal interest in the matter whatever, but I want to ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] if he does not believe it would be good policy to have our greatest arsenal in the interior of our country, far removed from any possible attack by an enemy?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes and no. I think it is of value to have the Rock Island Arsenal, and I think it is of value to develop it. I have undertaken to help in that movement, but I do not think it follows that because it is in the central part of the country it should be given always the preference over others. There are certain kinds of work that should be done on the coast rather than in the interior because of the saving of freight.

Mr. McKENZIE. I want to say to the gentleman from Kentucky that I agree with him perfectly in the matter of political pull. I am opposed to it all along the line, and I know the simple fact that a man is Secretary of War or Secretary of the Navy does not make him immune from influence any more than anyone else.

Mr. SHERLEY. I thoroughly agree with that statement, but there is nothing in the history of the Ordnance Department that warrants the belief that they are going to expend money at one arsenal as against another because of any ulterior purpose.

Mr. CURRY. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to the manufacture of projectiles at the Watertown Arsenal. I think there ought to be two Government manufactories of projectiles—one on the Atlantic and one on the Pacific coast. I believe the manufacture of projectiles on the coast to be for the best interests of the Government, on account of the saving of the transportation cost of the projectiles. It has been stated that the Watertown Arsenal is the only arsenal that has a sufficient amount of land.

Mr. SHERLEY. No one has made that statement. I said it had more land, and therefore would go through a larger development than the others.

Mr. CURRY. The Benecia Arsenal and Barracks have 339.7 acres.

Mr. SHERLEY. I hope the gentleman will not undertake to develop any plea for Benicia Arsenal, for it might require statements about that arsenal that would not be very flattering.

Mr. CURRY. I am prepared to answer any questions the gentleman may ask, and to go into details regarding the economic reasons for the development of Benicia Arsenal. So far as power is concerned, while the Benicia Arsenal has not its own power, it has cheaper power than any arsenal or public plant in the United States except, possibly, Rock Island. We pay 1 cent a kilowatt, and that is about as cheap as you can manufacture it. The Benicia Arsenal ought to be developed. It is the only arsenal on the Pacific coast, and the failure of Congress to develop that arsenal and properly care for it has cost the United States millions of dollars in the past and will cost it millions of dollars in the future if it does not take care of it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not entertain an amendment until the point of order is disposed of. The Chair understood the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw his point of order.

Mr. McKENZIE. I do withdraw it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 170, line 11, after the word "building," insert the words "at the Watertown Arsenal."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

In all, specifically for fortifications and armament thereof for the Panama Canal, $2,639,048.30.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Last year we carried a provision with reference to the disposition of moneys received from rents, fees, fines, and various other things. What has become of that?

Mr. FITZGERALD. We discontinued that and practically add the estimated amount to one of the appropriations.

Mr. MANN. That money is to be covered into the Treasury?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That until the close of the fiscal year 1916, when any material, supplies, and equipment heretofore or hereafter purchased or acquired for the construction of the Panama Canal is no longer needed, or is no longer serviceable, it may be sold in such manner as the President may direct, and without advertising in such classes of cases as may be authorized by him.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order against that section. I want to ask if that is in the existing law?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It has been carried several years and is in the current law. It was found that certain equipment used in the Government work on the canal could be disposed of by negotiation with persons who are engaged in construction work of different kinds in South American countries much more advantageously than it could if advertised and sold at public auction.

Mr. MANN. This is practically asking for a selling agent—to send somebody around to see if they can not sell it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; and it has resulted in getting beneficial terms. Instead of making it permanent, we have carried it from year to year, so that when the time comes when the bulk of the equipment has been worked off the authority will no longer be given. As the gentleman knows, all the equipment has been charged into the cost of the canal and the more that can be obtained for it now the more credit there is. The matter is very carefully guarded.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I would not like to see a similar policy adopted in regard to other property owned by the Government of the United States.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is only for the fiscal year.

Mr. COOPER. This provides that equipments heretofore or hereafter purchased or required for the construction of the canal may be sold, and so forth. It may be entirely serviceable, it may be just as good as when it was new, and yet here is an authority to sell it by private sale. If that sort of thing should obtain generally, it would open a way to all sorts of improper things and frauds.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I think we will all agree thoroughly with what the gentleman from Wisconsin says, but this was the situation on the canal: We had a large lot of equipment there—railroad equipment and otherwise—that might be useful somewhere. It did not pay to bring it back to the United States and advertise it for sale. They could not get anybody to go down there and examine it for bids to any extent, and it was proposed to pass a law giving the President authority to employ some one to go all over the world and sell it without restriction as to time. That was not thought desirable, but it was thought desirable two years ago to put in this temporary provision and see how it would work out, and if there were any objection to it it would automatically cease. As a matter of fact, they have railroad machinery that is worthless down there, worthless up here, because it is not of the standard size, and they have other things there of that kind. They have been able to get some one to watch out where they are adding new improvement work at different places in the world, sending to people who want the machinery and who are willing to take it at a higher price than could be obtained in any other way.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Among this is a large number of locomotives.

Mr. MANN. As I understand, there has been no abuse of it. Of course it would not do at all to apply it to the general Government service. We are all agreed about that, and it seemed more desirable to carry it here from year to year than it was to give permanent authority.

Mr. COOPER. I understand the force of the gentleman's statement, yet it does not convince me at all as to the desirability of this sort of legislation. Here are locomotives, here is valuable material which may be in condition for long use, and we propose to permit its disposition at private sale. It is said that the President will take care of it. The President is thousands of miles away from the Panama Canal, and he must depend upon the statements of somebody.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, it is practically a question of trying to sell it for something for a particular use or selling it for old junk. It saves money, that is all.

Mr. COOPER. I do not think so, with all due respect to the gentleman from Illinois. That statement would apply anywhere else. There is no more reason, in my judgment, why the man who will buy this at private sale would not bid for it if there were an advertisement of public sale any more than there would be in any other case in the disposition of public property.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, there are a large number of locomotives that no one would purchase for use as locomotives, because the gauge is 6 feet.

Mr. COOPER. Then advertise them and say here are a lot of locomotives at such and such a price.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They would be bought for scrap. They are holding them, and as construction is being undertaken in various South American countries they suggest to the people that if they will build instead of the standard-gauge track a track of 6-feet gauge they could make arrangements to sell locomotives to them at a price that would be profitable to the canal and profitable to the people doing the work.

Mr. MANN. They say that it has been very profitable.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will ask the gentleman to either make the point of order or let us proceed.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I would suggest to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] that the last time I was in Panama I talked with Col. Goethals and some of the other canal officials in regard to this very matter. I saw great lines of these worn engines and cars, a lot of rails, and other material of one sort and another. I became convinced that if we were to advertise all that stuff for sale we would get very few bidders and low bids. There would be very few buyers, but it did seem to me that if we had the stuff all listed and people going down there could see the material and buy such part as they desired and could secure it without having to wait for a sale, we might sell quite a quantity of it and at a very good price. As a matter of fact, I understand they are getting fair prices for what they have sold, considering the value of the material. My own opinion was that under the conditions in Panama they would get more for the material at private sale than they would if they were to advertise it.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, that same argument would apply to any other material for which the Government of the United States does not have immediate use. The same argument would apply to material in the United States proper.

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, no.

Mr. COOPER. Certainly it would.

Mr. MONDELL. Panama is a good many miles away and not easy to reach.

Mr. COOPER. If the Government of the United States has not immediate use of property, and it will list it, according to the gentleman's statement, people would come and look at it and buy it, or say what they would give for it.

Mr. MONDELL. If the material were where people could reach it and see it without traveling a great distance at a considerable cost and spending a lot of time, it would be entirely proper to advertise, and that would be the way to do it, but this involves a five-day trip down to Panama and a five-day trip back. People may not be able to go at the time of the sale.

Mr. COOPER. The man who buys this at private sale goes and looks at the property, and he must make that five-day trip down and five-day trip back.

Mr. MONDELL. If he does, he can buy the material right then and there, the minute that he arrives. He does not have to wait for a 30-day advertisement and all that sort of thing. But it is not absolutely necessary for a purchaser to go there at all.

Mr. COOPER. No; but if you advertise, he would make the five-day trip at the proper time. I object to this provision.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin make the point of order?

Mr. COOPER. I make the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That in measuring vessels for the purpose of imposing and collecting tolls at the Panama Canal and for other purposes the measurement shall be determined in all cases by the Panama Canal rules, and the maximum and minimum tolls for vessels of commerce prescribed in section 5 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone," approved August 24, 1912, shall be based on net tonnage as determined by said Panama Canal rules.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the provision that it changes existing law as to the levying of tolls.

This proposed legislation is an attempt to legalize the levying of a toll upon deck loads of vessels, thus discriminating against Pacific coast shipping interests. The Panama Canal act provides that the tolls when based upon net registered tonnage for ships of commerce "shall not exceed $1.25 per net registered ton." The President, by proclamation, fixed the toll rate for vessels of commerce at $1.20 per net registered ton. This toll has been collected and in addition an added charge has been made for deck loads, which is clearly contrary to law.

Lumber vessels do not load to their full capacity below decks, because of the convenience, particularly in the handling of long lengths, in utilizing the deck space. It requires less time to load and discharge. For this reason they do not load to a full capacity below. It should be borne in mind that a vessel is charged upon its full net registered tonnage, whether it is loaded to its full capacity or only carries half a load. Say a half of a load was carried below. It would be possible, should this authority be given—an authority now being illegally exercised—to collect a toll for the full net registered capacity of the ship and for the deck load in addition. It is bad enough for the owners of American ships to pay a toll through this American waterway, without being compelled to pay an amount greater than the law contemplated. Under the Suez Canal rules it is specially provided that "deck loads" are not comprised in the measurement. The navigation laws of the United States provide that nothing shall be added to the gross tonnage for any sheltered space above the upper deck, which is under cover and open to the weather—that is, not inclosed. (R. S., 4153, Mar. 2, 1895.)

The charge has been made that unsafe freak ships might be constructed. This could be easily regulated. The Suez Canal rules prohibit the overloading of decks. For these reasons I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York care to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, it is subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the Joint Land Commission established under article 15 of the treaty between the United States and the Republic of Panama, proclaimed February 26, 1904, shall not have jurisdiction to adjudicate or settle any claim originating under any lease or contract for occupancy heretofore or hereafter made by the Panama Railroad Co. of lands or property owned by said Panama Railroad Co. in the Canal Zone, and no part of the moneys appropriated by this or any other act shall be used to pay such claims.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this is new legislation.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York care to be heard?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; but I will offer an amendment in lieu of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained, and the gentleman from New York offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 171, in lieu of the section stricken out insert:

"SEC. 4. No part of the money appropriated by this act shall be used for the payment of salaries or expenses of the joint land commission established under article 15 of the treaty between the United States and the Republic of Panama in adjudicating or settling any claim originating under any lease or contract for occupancy made by the Panama Railroad Co. in the Canal Zone or for the payment of any award made by said commission on account of any such claims."

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a ruling. I think it is a limitation on the appropriation.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to submit an inquiry to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish the Chair would rule on the point of order first.

Mr. SIMS. It is concerning this very proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is a limitation, and overrules the point of order.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I think I know, but I would like to have the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] give the reasons why he thinks this amendment proper, so that it may go into the RECORD at the point where the amendment is offered.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, in the depopulation of the Canal Zone, due to raising the water, the Panama Canal Railroad has made certain leases at Gatun and Cascades, and when the order was issued to depopulate the zone those leases were revocable at will. The persons who had them—the natives there—had erected temporary shacks, some places with a little patch, and were declining to move unless they were compensated. There was no legal obligation upon the part of the Government, but the attorney for the Panama Railroad Co. found it was easier and better to pay some trifling sums to these persons and have them move out. A short time ago the joint land commission decided it should have jurisdiction of all those cases, and insisted on their being brought before the commission for adjudication rather than be settled in this way. The result will be that a number of claims upon the zone, with no foundation whatever, which could be adjusted and cleaned up by some trifling payment, must be brought before the joint land commission. They must sit there and hear the statements and review each case, and then determine if they have any claim. Well, the members of this commission receive $15 a day and $10 for expenses. They will get enough of these claims so that it will be a very profitable undertaking, so far as the commission is concerned, but a very expensive and useless proceeding, so far as the Government is concerned.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman has also considered the question in connection with the Panama Canal treaty. Does the gentleman think there is anything in that——

Mr. FITZGERALD. All of these claims, if they are brought before the commission, will be decided against the claimants, and the only effect of the ruling of the commission is that it will stimulate the presentation of a great volume of claims they have to pass upon. It is notorious there is no foundation for claims against the Government, but it will lengthen the life of the commission.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That in prescribing regulations under the provisions of section 5 of the sundry civil act of August 1, 1914, the President shall provide that in lieu of furnishing to the auditor individual detail collection vouchers, not provided for in said regulations, two competent persons, one from the office of the Auditor for the War Department, designated by the auditor, and one from the office of the Comptroller of the Treasury, designated by the comptroller, shall be sent semiannually, at such time as may be designated by the comptroller, to the Canal Zone to examine the accounts and vouchers and verify the submitted schedules of collections and report in triplicate to the Auditor for the War Department, the Comptroller of the Treasury, and the auditor of the Panama Canal; and such persons shall make such other examination into the accounts of the Panama Canal as may be directed by the comptroller, and for all such purposes they shall have access to all records and papers pertaining thereto. Such examination and inspection shall be made for the period covered by the persons designated as soon as practicable, and the report of such persons shall be promptly filed. Such persons shall be furnished their transportation going and returning, including meals, and be paid a per diem of $4 from the day of sailing from the United States until return thereto, both days inclusive, in lieu of subsistence on the Isthmus and all other expenses, out of such appropriation for the Panama Canal as may be designated by the governor.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]——

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin reserves a point of order.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], knowing that he is familiar with the conditions on the Panama Canal Zone, whether or not it is possible to use any considerable portion of the equipment on the Panama Canal Zone in the construction of the railway in Alaska?

Mr. MANN. I do not think it is possible to use very much, and they do not think so.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. During the debate last summer on the Alaskan railway bill it was asserted, as I remember, that that was quite possible and feasible.

Mr. MANN. My recollection is—I am not sure I am right about that—that when the Isthmian Canal Commission reported upon this subject, as they did, men who had been engaged in construction work down there reported in the neighborhood of a million or a million and a half dollars' worth of equipment which possibly might be used for the Alaskan railroad. I should doubt it would be as much as that, yet it might be. Most of the equipment down there is either iron railway locomotives or cars which are not of standard gauge. The standard gauge is 4 feet and 8 inches, whereas the Panama Canal gauge is 5 feet in width; but, still, some of them can be readjusted, and would be valuable. Now, the other machinery that they have down there is largely excavation machinery of a kind and character that will not be worth anything at all in Alaska. Of course, some incidental things they could use.

Mr. SMITH of Minnesota. I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin make the point of order?

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order. Before I speak to that, however, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois if there are not a considerable number of dredges down there which could be used in work in this country?

Mr. MANN. Well, they have a good many Bucyrus steam dredges with large shovels that would be of use in this country or elsewhere, although most of the dredges they have there with the large shovels can not be used in very many places. The 3-yard dredge is fairly good in various places. They have some now with 15-yard dippers. Of course, they would not be of use anywhere else in the world except there. The 5-yard is not so good in most places in this country; but those dredges which could be used are a valuable asset.

Mr. COOPER. I have heard it said by one who ought to know that some of these dredges and some of the excavating machinery could be used to great advantage in the improvement of the Mississippi River at a very great lessening of the expense and with very great benefit, and expedite, if I may use the word, the project for the lower river.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will permit, some of the dredges that are in the water and work under water might be of advantage with reference to some of the river and harbor improvements of this country; but they have a demand for them down there, and it will be a long time before they are through. In those places they are using them to excavate the slides, and the slides will be with us, I expect, until the gentleman from Wisconsin and myself are laid on the table.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Those are for maintenance purposes.

Mr. COOPER. Some are to be retained for maintenance purposes, but I do not think all are to be retained.

Mr. MANN. They use them in connection with the slides.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And they will be used on the coast channels and other parts. They are proposing to buy a new one now.

Mr. COOPER. I want to ask the gentleman from New York as to why this change is proposed in section 5?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Comptroller of the Treasury decided that the audit of the accounts of the transactions on the canal, the papers and other transactions, should be sent to Washington, to be passed on here. That is practically impossible; so Col. Goethals and the Comptroller of the Treasury took the matter up and worked out this system by which the original audit will be made by the auditor for the Canal Zone. And then twice a year a representative of the office of the Comptroller of the Treasury and a representative of the Auditor for the War Department, under whom these accounts come, shall visit the zone and make an examination, just like an examination of accounts in a commercial business. It was a matter in which it was difficult to determine just what should be done. The comptroller at first thought that on every commercial transaction a voucher should show the cost to the Government and the profit. There was no possible way that could be figured out. And to transmit all of the papers in connection with every transaction would so multiply the work connected with the canal it would not only be expensive but very unnecessary. So the Comptroller of the Treasury and Col. Goethals, when he was here last month, went over this matter and worked out this arrangement, that the auditing might be done by the auditor on the Canal Zone; and in order that there might be a proper check, one representative of the Auditor of the War Department and one representative of the comptroller should twice a year visit the Canal Zone and check over these accounts.

Mr. COOPER. Col. Goethals was of the opinion that this was the better way?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That this was the only practicable way they could work it out, and they have gotten together on the matter and agreed to it.

Mr. COOPER. I am disposed to yield to the opinion of such a man as Col. Goethals, reenforced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD], but, generally speaking, I do not believe in auditing things 2,000 or 3,000 miles from the seat of government.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The advantage really is to audit a transaction at the place where it occurs, the same as with a great commercial business.

Mr. COOPER. We compel postmasters and collectors and all that sort of people to send their accounts here to Washington to be audited.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That appropriations herein for printing and binding shall not be used for any annual report or the accompanying documents unless the copy therefor is furnished to the Public Printer in the following manner: Copies of the documents accompanying such annual reports on or before the 15th day of October of each year; copies of the annual reports on or before the 15th day of November of each year; and complete revised proofs of the accompanying documents and the annual reports on the 10th and 20th days of November of each year, respectively. The provisions of this section shall not apply to the annual reports of the Smithsonian Institution, the Commissioner of Patents, or the Comptroller of the Currency.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I intended to ask a question in reference to the preceding paragraph, as to sending auditors to the Isthmus. The language reads:

Such persons shall be furnished their transportation going and returning, including meals, and be paid a per diem of $4 from the day of sailing from the United States until return thereto, both days inclusive, in lieu of subsistence on the Isthmus and all other expenses.

Upon what theory do we furnish transportation and meals to a man going from New York to Colon and then pay him $4 a day for subsistence besides, or, when we furnish his subsistence in kind, why do we pay a commutation for it in addition?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not think we should pay it while they are on the boat, except there are some additional expenses on the boat. I do not believe they should get the per diem while they are on the boat.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Is there ever a bridge whist game on the boat?

Mr. STAFFORD. There would be if the gentleman were there.

Mr. MANN. This will not amount to a great deal, probably, but there are a great many cases in the Government service where we furnish either subsistence in kind or a per diem, and I would hate to see us start in on the plan of furnishing both at the same time, because that would amount to a good deal in some cases.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It only amounts to about $50.

Mr. MANN. I know it does not amount to very much here, but you can not make a precedent of this kind and stop. I am not going to offer an objection at this time, however.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That all sums appropriated by this act for salaries of officers and employees of the Government shall be in full for such salaries for the fiscal year 1916, and all laws or parts of laws to the extent they are in conflict with the provisions of this act are repealed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 33 to offer an amendment in connection with a matter about which the gentleman from Illinois inquired.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to return to page 33 for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 33, line 12, strike out the word "notes" and insert in lieu thereof the word "currency."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I inquired of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, and this corrects the matter that the gentleman from Illinois called attention to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment in connection with the same matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 38, in line 5, strike out the word "securities" and insert in lieu thereof the word "currency."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 61 to provide for a motor-propelled vehicle at the Chickamauga National Park.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York to return to page 61 for the purpose of offering an amendment?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 61, line 7, after the word "of," insert the words "one motor-propelled and one."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday we passed a provision in the Reclamation Service until to-day. A provision has been prepared, after consultation with the Reclamation Service, which I think is acceptable to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] and acceptable to the gentleman from Missouri, who demurred, and acceptable to myself, a neutral. If the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] will withdraw his amendment, I will offer this amendment to strike out the paragraph and insert the following.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the pending amendment to the paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] withdraws his amendment to page 106, which was passed over, and the gentleman fram New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] offers the following amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the paragraph beginning with line 1 and ending with line 5, on page 106, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"No work shall be undertaken or expenditure made for any lands for which the construction charge has been fixed by public notice, which work or expenditure shall, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, increase the construction cost above the construction charge so fixed, unless and until a valid and binding agreement to repay the cost thereof shall have been entered into between the Secretary of the Interior and the water-right applicants and entrymen affected by such increase cost, as provided by section 4 of the act of August 13, 1914, entitled 'An act extending the period of payment under reclamation projects, and for other purposes.'"

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to state that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] has a unanimous-consent request which the Chair will put to the committee. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to recur to page 112, to the items concerning Howard University, which were stricken out on a point of order. The gentleman asks that that ruling of the Chair be vacated, and that the committee return to that item and reconsider it. Is there objection?

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi objects.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill favorably to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Chairman, pending that, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD in explanation of the point of order made against a paragraph of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the subject of Howard University.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of Howard University. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] moves that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRISP, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 21318) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and for other purposes, had directed him to report it back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and that the bill as amended do pass.

DESIGNATION OF SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE FOR TO-MORROW.

The SPEAKER. Before the Chair puts that question, he desires to designate Mr. WALSH, of New Jersey, to preside to-morrow.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FITZGERALD, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill H. R. 21161, the pension appropriation bill.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, pending that I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTLETT. And pending my motion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HINEBAUGH], who is the ranking minority member, if he desires to enter into any agreement about general debate on the bill? I have a good many requests for time on this side of the House, without taking into consideration any time for myself to explain the bill or make any remarks about it, for about three hours. I have requests for about two hours and five minutes, not including members of the committee or including the time I would like to occupy myself, so that it seems to me that almost three hours on this side is requested.

Mr. HINEBAUGH. Three hours would be satisfactory to this side.

Mr. BARTLETT. That would be six hours of general debate. That is the gentleman's suggestion—three hours to a side?

Mr. HINEBAUGH. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on the bill be limited to six hours, three hours to a side.

The SPEAKER. Pending the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT] asks unanimous consent that general debate on this bill be limited to six hours, one-half of the time to be controlled by himself and the other half to be controlled by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HINEBAUGH]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion to go into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the pension appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 21161, the pension appropriation bill, with Mr. CLINE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 21161, the pension appropriation bill, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 21161) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and for other purposes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, the bill is short, but I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of it be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, just a word in reference to the bill.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. It is now a quarter to 3 o'clock. I am not sure that all the time in general debate will be used, but I take it that it is quite certain that the gentleman will not have the bill ready to-night for amendment.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes. The gentleman can go on that assumption that we will not.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. Certainly.

Mr. STAFFORD. How long does the gentleman contemplate running to-night?

Mr. BARTLETT. I am not disposed at this time in the week, after the continuous attention that the House has given to the business during the past week, to press the bill to an unusual hour, because, in my judgment, we have ample time to pass the appropriation bills in the House. If there were any necessity to keep the House in session to an unusual hour I would not object, but there is nothing to be accomplished by it.

Mr. STAFFORD. There will be no question but what the bill will be gotten out of the way by Tuesday next?

Mr. BARTLETT. I apprehend the gentleman understands that Monday will not be occupied by this bill. I have no question that the bill will be finished some time during Tuesday. There are some amendments to be offered by gentlemen of the committee which will probably provoke some discussion. Otherwise I do not know that there is any reason to take very long after the general debate is over.

Mr. STAFFORD. Then we are to understand that the committee will not run very late this afternoon?

Mr. BARTLETT. Down my way even plowhands are entitled to some part of Saturday afternoon off, and I think Members of Congress ought to be entitled to as much.

Mr. Chairman, I started to say that I would not occupy the time of the committee in any detailed explanation of this bill at the present time. The bill carries $165,000,000. Since the hearings were had before the committee further investigations have been made, and I have a letter from the Secretary of the Interior which will justify us in reducing that amount to $164,000,000 at least, and that amendment will be offered.

I now yield one hour to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES].

[Mr. DIES addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. HINEBAUGH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 25 minutes to the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS].

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I am not vain enough to think that I can add anything of value to the general philosophy applicable to the subject of the remarks of the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. DIES]. Nor am I vain enough to think that I can even restate the form of such philosophy to improve its application this afternoon. There are a few things, however, that I wish to say, not in defense of socialism, not in defense of individualism, not in defense of communism, for none of these principles in their proper field of application needs any defense at all. I know it is the habit of superficial talkers, if not superficial thinkers, to classify themselves and others as socialists and individualists or communists, and then in a word and in a moment determine and solve every problem before society. I want to say that in any real sense there are no socialists, there are no communists, there are no individualists in this Congress to-day, or, rather, to state it more accurately, every one of us is a combination of all three.

There is not a man here who would assign the farm and the factory and the grocery store to socialistic action. There is not a man here who would assign the public school and the public road to the field of individualism. I hope there is not a man here who would take from the post office the functions that it has so beneficently discharged in the last hundred years all over the world.

Socialism represents the Postal Department, communism the roads and the public schools. The maxim of communism is, "To every man according to his need; from every man according to his power"; and so the bachelor and the childless taxpayer is taxed to maintain the public schools. The same maxim is applied by the State to the public roads, and it collects the cost of their maintenance from the taxpayer whether he has automobiles or wagons to run over the roads or not. In the post office the socialistic maxim, "To every man according to his deed" is applied, and there we pay for what we get, and the worker is supposed to be paid according to the value of his service.

The rule of individualism implies the field of individual initiative and capital, with no interference from the State except to enforce contracts and protect the citizen in the enjoyment of what he calls his own. Now, organized society has never been able to get along successfully as a one-idea or one-fingered institution, and has had to employ all three of these principles and doubtless will always continue to do so. It is for the publicist and political economist to decide from time to time after careful examination and analysis of the particular facts and circumstances whether an activity which the citizen can not conduct for himself, according to the rules of private finance, shall be conducted by society under the rules of public finance.

Around each of these principles is a set of shibboleths and aphorisms which were designed as battle cries of their partisans to characterize themselves or their foes. What I protest against this afternoon is the inconsiderate use of these sayings, that really start nowhere and get nobody anywhere—this light aphorist, the man with the mouth full of maxims and apothegms, which he shoots out at you upon all occasions, which are mere substitutes for thought by statesmen, mere short cuts to conclusions, which only avoid particular labor, work, and study of political problems, so essential for their wise solution. A favorite aphorism among the class active this afternoon is "the least government is the best government." If you can say that "the least government is the best government," then you have disposed of all progressive problems for a hundred years. You will leave the Government just where Jefferson left it, completely crystallized and with no development, utterly oblivious of the complete change of social relations and the revolution in human affairs. Can not such gentlemen understand that what may be a philosophy in one age may become a mere prejudice in another age? Can not gentlemen understand that the idea of "the least government is the best government" applied to France before the Revolution represented, in a brief statement, the most magnificent philosophy of human freedom, but applied to our day has become a mere prejudice and often a mere barrier in the way of human progress? [Applause.]

The man who invented the aphorism, when he invented it, performed some service to society and enabled groups to think and express themselves with facility; but the man who applies it indiscriminately to our problems, and in these days, is only standing in the way of progress and employing it as a mere substitute for investigation of particular problems.

Let us take, for example, the shipping bill the immediate incitement, I presume, for the most witty address you have just heard. You can settle that question very readily if you will just think of the right apothegm, the right aphorism, and that happens to be "the least government is the best government," which is on the lips of every monopolist and exploiter of special privilege. But, good God, what would it mean so applied, gentlemen of the House? Here are the rates on the ocean to-day that run five to ten times the normal rates. Suppose the transportation agencies inside the country were to suddenly raise their rates five or ten times, would you have a filibuster and the aphoristic statesman on your hands, or have a revolution of the most dangerous character? [Applause.]

But because it happens to be out on the ocean, invisible to the provincial eye, is it to be dismissed? Let us see. Transportation, after all, has been recognized for centuries as representing a field in which the Government found one of its first duties. It went so far as to adopt the communistic principle in order to put a road to every man's door. Is that duty to be utterly neglected on the ocean? Let us analyze the case. We can not regulate ocean rates through the Interstate Commerce Commission, unfortunately, because the carrying property is not the property of citizens of this Republic, and because representing alien property, as it mostly does, its right to do commerce, its right to bring shipments here and take them away, is protected by innumerable treaties. We are unable to use the instrumentality of regulation, therefore, in that field as we have done with the railroads.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Yes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS of Mississippi. To what treaty provision does the gentleman refer that would prevent the Federal Government from regulating oceanic rates?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. I am unable to refer now to any special treaty. I am giving my opinion that the treaty relations of the country would prohibit it at this time.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman will remember that the subsidy, so called, given under the Underwood tariff bill could not be put into effect because of treaties with foreign nations.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. I am convinced there are complications, diplomatic and probably economic, which prevent this Government employing regulation as one of the instruments of relief. What are we to do? Here are transportation rates ten times normal. The hog is in the garden of our commerce, and this Democracy, now responsible to the people, in some fashion ought to get that hog out. She is going, perhaps, to tangle her skirts and muss up the aphoristic statesmen in doing it, but the duty is present, and this administration ought to be applauded for the courage with which it meets problems so presented instead of impliedly being denounced as the author of all kinds of fantastic, irresponsible socialism.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman saw fit in his omnibus characterization of governmental action to take up the subject of the telephone and the telegraph, a subject with which my own labors here in the House have been peculiarly associated. It is true that every country in the world, democratic, monarchical, republican, and what not, has treated the electrical communication the same as the letter communication, and that that function has been postalized throughout the world. Let me make a sensational statement this afternoon. I do not usually indulge in that habit, but I am going to take the liberty to do so now.

The business man of the United States has to pay as much to ship a long-distance telephone communication over the wires of our country as he has to pay to ship a ton of freight over the rails. I mean that the scale of telephone charges for long-distance purposes amounts to 6 mills a mile, while the railroads get 7 mills a mile for carrying an average ton of freight, so gentlemen can see how very weighty their conversations sometimes are—over the telephone, at least.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. If that long-distance telephonic charge is unreasonable, why does not the Interstate Commerce Commission under the powers vested in it under the Mann Act exercise those powers and make a reasonable rate?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Why, gentle shepherd, tell me why. Why? Because the whole theory of regulation is nearly worthless, applied to certain kinds of monopoly, and you can not secure through the theory of regulation—in the postal field—the kind of rates and the kind of service that the postal function can give you if it is allowed to do so. Regulation is not a substitute for competition or postal action. Why do the express companies to-day not carry a pound parcel for a nickel? Because they can not do it. They are losing money on 21 cents, the lowest rate fixed by regulation. I can give the gentleman the facts about these things, if the House would have the patience to listen to them, but my purpose in rising this afternoon was, so far as least as one member of the majority party is concerned, to express an emphatic dissent to this implied denunciation of the administration.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. But in the case of express companies the Interstate Commerce Commission, though laggard for many years, did exercise that power and reduce the rates, and it did lower the exorbitant charges and make reasonable charges.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. It reduced the 25-cent rate to 21 cents, and Postmaster General Burleson reduced his rate to a nickel. He is making money at a nickel rate, and the express companies to-day are losing money at a quarter.

But that is the trouble with this whole problem. I am not implying that the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD] illustrates it. These gentlemen who have their stock aphorisms and apothegms can not ever be gotten to investigate particular facts. The votary of that easy philosophy does not need to examine facts. He never needs to discriminate or distinguish human conditions and circumstances. He has an aphoristic arrow that he can shoot straight to the star of the ideal solution any moment you give him a chance to talk. Take the telegraph business, for example. Of course Government operation must be uneconomical. That is fundamental with the aphorists. Well, in Australia to-day the cost to the Government of shipping a telegram, over a country as large as our own, is just 27 cents on the average. It costs the American companies 48 cents.

I am not speaking of rates; I am speaking of cost of service to the companies that conduct it. And, moreover, the number of telegraph stations in that country are about seven to one as compared with this. I want to say that while it may not always be true, when a private financier is given a complete monopoly of the field you are going to have two results in all probability. One result is the highest rates, rates that will cut down the traffic and service to society. The other is uneconomical service, the lowest product per dollar expended—and our telegraph agencies illustrate this very principle. This means low operative efficiency. I mean in the work done by the employees engaged therein. The private monopoly does not get as much product out of the employee as postal monopolies are getting, and that is true of the telephone monopoly and of the telegraph monopoly as well.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. I will.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Upon what authority or information does the gentleman make the statement that the telegraph operatives of this country are less efficient than the operatives in other countries?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. I will give the gentleman the specific facts. The function of telegraphic institutions is to handle telegrams, and the number handled per year per telegraphic employee in New Zealand amounts to 4,000. The number handled per year per telegraph employee in the United States amounts to 2,900. The number of telegrams per office in the United States, upon which the operative had a chance to make a record, was some 41 per day. It was only 12 in New Zealand. The telegraph monopoly of the United States is absolutely reeking with functional inefficiency, while it charges rates that run from two to four times those of other countries.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Have the investigations of the gentleman led him to inquire as to the number of telegraph offices per capita of Australia and the United States?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Seven times as many there as here. [Applause.]

Mr. CAMPBELL. Seven times as many offices?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Yes, sir; compared to population. I know these facts sound incredible to gentlemen, and they will sound incredible to any school that has been instructed by an aphoristic school-teacher. Of course the Government can not do anything efficiently; of course it can not do anything economically, he thinks. It is against all the philosophy of the aphorist. Our point of view in these matters ought not to be determined by aphorisms that ought to be in the grave with the heroes who made them 100 years ago.

A Member of Congress, responsible to the Nation, ought to be willing to dig into the facts for conclusions and not merely doctor the great American patient with cheap aphorisms. [Applause.] Take the Bell system. Nobody denies its magnificent development. It collects nearly half of the telephone revenue of the world. I have no prejudices against it; but it is a fact at the same time that the postal telephone systems of the world, with rates about one-half per message, are getting nearly twice as much product out of their employees as the Bell system is getting out of its employees. Why? Because its rates are so high that the machine can not be fully utilized. On the long-distance lines abroad the rates run from one-fourth to one-eighth what they are here, and the result is those lines are utilized 10 per cent of their maximum potentiality. Here we utilize only 4 per cent of the possible maximum. Of course the aphorist has no time or need to take into account mere humble facts and human circumstances like these. Now I want to say to gentlemen who think they are going to shut off the progress of humanity with shining claptrap and characterization that there is growing up in this country some protestants. The responsible radical has come. He has no simple rules by which everything can be solved, but he studies the field and examines the facts and circumstances, and from that examination constructs his conclusions. He reports to the president of the company that a bridge is rotten and ought to go down. The aphorist would burn it down and take his time to build a new one, but the responsible radical will leave that bridge stand until a new bridge is constructed, so that traffic will not stop for a moment.

Now, I want to say that kind of a man is coming into the field of government the world over. His idea is to march forward. His philosophy embraces all men. I have no patience with the philosophy that fits only the strong man, the fine man, the man with superior mind or muscles. It is the philosophy of the jungle, that does not take into account the weak brother whom every moral system, and especially our own Christian system, takes into account, and whom our own social aspirations and our own fundamental laws as well take into account, as inseparable members of society. The gentleman said that he was utterly opposed to the doctrine that the Government owed any man a job. Of course, stated in that way here, we all would be opposed to it. But at the same time it is immutably true that the jobless, houseless, farmless, landless man is entitled to an opportunity to earn his bread and keep from starving. That is an inevitable implication from his membership in society and his right to live.

I know this truth is written in every conscience here this afternoon. Now, we have not been able so far to define this ethical right in terms of law. It is our misfortune and his misfortune, too. But the ethical right exists, and future generations of statesmen will write it in the form of law despite the aphorist and his easy philosophy.

Now, gentlemen of the House, I am for the administration in this matter. [Applause.]

Mr. GORDON. Will you let me ask you a question right there?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Yes.

Mr. GORDON. Where do you find any warrant in the Constitution of the United States to engage the people of the United States in the business of carrying goods, wares, and merchandise for hire upon the open sea?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. The Supreme Court a half dozen times has affirmed it.

Mr. GORDON. The Constitution, I said.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. I will let the Supreme Court be my witness. They are pretty safe researchers in constitutional law. Half a dozen times, I will say to the gentleman from Ohio, the Supreme Court has decided that the Government can take all instruments of interstate and foreign commerce, condemn them, and operate them for its own purpose. The legal authority would seem to be the least questionable feature of the subject. The economical side of it is new and might be questioned, but the legal authority is clear.

Mr. GORDON. Of course, you do not answer me the question. I ask you to point it out in the Constitution. On what clause of the Constitution does the Supreme Court base all this authority?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. On the clause which provides for the regulation of interstate and foreign commerce.

Mr. GORDON. Would you cite that case?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. The last case is the case of Wilson against Shaw, who was then Treasurer of the United States, and may be found in Two hundred and fourth United States Reports, page 24, decided within the last 10 years.

Mr. WEBB. It is Wilson against Shaw, in the Two hundred and fourth United States Reports.

Mr. PLATT. Does the gentleman imply that gives the Government of the United States the right to condemn a ship?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. If it is an instrument of interstate commerce and American property——

Mr. PLATT. But if it is an instrument of foreign commerce?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Equally so. If it were not used in interstate or in foreign commerce, the right might be questioned.

Mr. CALLAWAY. One question. You compared the necessity for highways by saying that the Government, first realizing that necessity, provided public roads over which the people could carry their stuff.

Now, there can be no comparison at all between undertaking to carry their freight in bottoms and merely preparing roads over which people could carry their stuff. The high seas would be the equivalent of the roads over which the stuff goes. To carry freight in bottoms would be equivalent to furnishing them transportation to haul their stuff over roads on land.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Well, the physical comparison may be somewhat inexact, but the gentleman should remember that in nearly all other countries the State has provided not only the roads, but the vehicles themselves.

Mr. CALLAWAY. There is one further question that I want to ask the gentleman, and that is if he has gone into the facts so that he is able to compare this Government with that of Germany? I understand there are fundamental differences between the formation of this Government and that of other Governments, and I wanted to know if the gentleman had looked into that, so that he could give the House when he discusses that thing later a dissertation on our Government, formed as it is, as compared with other Governments, taking into consideration the voter, who is interested in drawing his salary and retaining his job here, as compared with like employment of similar men in other countries.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. I will say that I have heard that question discussed. In Germany, for example, it was said there was a class accustomed to command and another class accustomed to obey, and they could secure efficiency in those matters when we could not. I have tested that out in only one respect, and that is in comparing our postal establishment with theirs. Our postal establishment takes as its unit of service the number of mail pieces, and when you take the number of employees and divide them into the number of mail pieces handled in the United States in 1912 we find they averaged some 60,000 per employee. Our postal employee ranked away ahead of all other nations in that respect, including Germany, so that the supposition that our postal establishment is economically inefficient in comparison with that of other countries is not sustained.

Mr. MARTIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maryland yield to the gentleman from South Dakota?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the Supreme Court of the United States in numerous cases has held that the power exists in the Federal Government under the Constitution to take over and operate the instrumentalities of interstate commerce?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN. Will the gentleman have the kindness to attach a list of those cases to his remarks?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Yes. Another case is that of the Monongahela Navigation Co. case, 148, page 34. The cases are given in Nichols on Eminent Domain, section 23.

Mr. LEVY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Yes.

Mr. LEVY. Do I understand that the Interstate Commerce Commission has no control over our shipping?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. None over foreign shipping.

Mr. LEVY. I understood the gentleman to say that, and I wondered, because the Interstate Commerce Commission has control over commerce.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for one question?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. As to the efficiency of our Postal Service as compared with that of Germany, what about the cost of handling the packages and the salaries of the employees?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Our salaries are somewhat larger, but not so much so as is supposed. Because of the fact that the telegraphs and telephones are added to the postal service in Germany some of the fiscal comparisons can not be made.

Mr. SISSON. Can the gentleman make a comparison as to the cost per package? Of course, you would have to take into consideration the distance, because it is so much greater here than in Germany. But has the gentleman made a comparison as to the cost per package per employee?

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Germany does not happen to report postal expenses as distinguished from telegraph and telephone expenses, and therefore a comparison can not be made.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maryland has expired.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HINEBAUGH] desire to use some time now?

Mr. HINEBAUGH. No more to-night.

Mr. BARTLETT. Then I will yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERWOOD] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a few remarks of a practical nature touching pensions. A magazine called the World's Work has been publishing a series of articles by an unworthy son of a distinguished sire of Massachusetts on my dollar-a-day pension bill, and these articles have all been based on the estimate by the former Commissioner of Pensions, Mr. Davenport, to the effect that the bill carried $75,000,000.

I made an investigation of that question in company with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ADAIR], and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL], both members of the Committee on Invalid Pensions. We made an estimate as to what the bill would cost if enacted into law, notwithstanding the estimate fo the Commissioner of Pensions, and that estimate of ours was proclaimed by your humble speaker on the floor of the House when the bill finally passed on the 10th of May, 1912. That estimate was $21,000,000. The report of the Commissioner of Pensions for the year succeeding the passage of that law gave the amount of money that had been paid out in pensions under that law at $20,800,000, so that was less by $200,000 than the estimate made by the members of the Pension Committee. And now, in February, 1915, the World's Work magazine—and I am not rising now to a question of privilege, because I do not care what the World's Work says about it, one way or the other—has an editorial in which I am designated as "a pension fanatic," and so forth. It does not seem to be understood that we had a great war in this country; and notwithstanding the present war in Europe I still claim that the war in the United States from 1861 to 1865 was the fiercest, the bloodiest, and the longest-enduring war of modern times.

Let us take the leading characteristics of these two wars for a moment. I carried a musket that was estimated to kill at 800 yards. I would load that musket by five motions. I carried 40 rounds of ammunition, every round done up in brown paper; and the man who passed the examination then as a volunteer had to have a good set of front teeth in order to tear the brown paper from the cartridge. Now, a European soldier can pass an examination if he has no teeth at all. They are now carrying a gun that will shoot to kill at 2,000 yards. That gun will shoot 10 times as frequently and is 10 times as destructive as the guns the Volunteers carried 50 years ago.

Our field cannon—the largest that we carried—was a 20-pound Parrot gun. Now they are using a gun that will carry for 6 miles. Our guns were all muzzle-loaders. Now the man who operates a machine gun is behind armor plate; he is protected. Our trenches were thrown up overnight. Now they are having trenches built from 5 to 6 feet deep, and they are covered with an impervious substance to prevent the havoc of exploding shells. Our armies on both sides were in clear view of each other. Now the armies on both sides are all out of sight, not to be seen.

Let me call your attention to this fact, that to-day the two armies confronting each other in France and Belgium and the two armies confronting each other on the Russian border have not practically changed their positions for two months. What was the truth about our Army in the great Civil War? Take the army of Gen. Sherman, whose base of supply was at Louisville, Ky. It fought its way first to Nashville, from Nashville to Chattanooga, from Chattanooga to Rocky Face Mountain, from Rocky Face Mountain to Atlanta, from Atlanta to Savannah, from Savannah up the coast to Raleigh, to the close of the war. How many miles did that army march? Eleven hundred and twenty-five miles. In the Atlanta campaign of 110 days we made an advance of 1 mile a day—110 miles from Rocky Face Mountain to Atlanta in 110 days.

Here is another consideration. How many distinguished major generals and brigadier generals have lost their lives in this war? I am talking now to a very select audience, who are supposed to read the newspapers and the cablegrams. Is there a gentleman on this floor who can name a single brigadier or major general who has been killed in battle in this gigantic European war? They have a line over 100 miles long in the army of the west and over 100 miles long in the army of the east. They have a battle line of over 209 miles, and we read of desperate bayonet charges every day. There can not be any successful bayonet charges when they carry guns that will kill at a mile, because every column would be annihilated before it reached half a mile. If I were a betting man, which I am not, I would bet my month's salary against a Panama bond that you can not find five soldiers in any field hospital in France, or Germany, or England, or Russia, or Hungary who are wounded with bayonets. We read of the terrible destruction in these battles. They have fought 40 great battles, according to the reports. I venture the assertion that they have not lost 25 per cent of their armies in battle.

Why, my friends, at the Battle of Franklin, where I happened to be; just at the right of the Franklin Pike, in a battle line of two and one-half miles, 12 Confederate generals were killed or mortally wounded—all on the front line of battle—in five hours' fighting. Do you know of any general being killed while leading a charging column over in this European war? There is quite a characteristic difference therefore between the commanders of our Armies in the Civil War and of those over across the ocean.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHERWOOD. Will the gentleman give me five minutes more?

Mr. BARTLETT. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. SHERWOOD. At the Battle of Resaca, on the 14th of May, 1864, I saw Gen. Hooker, in the full uniform of a major general, with his yellow sash across his breast, magnificently mounted, right on the skirmish line. I commanded the Union advance at Pine Mountain, at the right of Kenesaw, about a mile, the day that Bishop Polk was shot. I was mounted and near the cannon which fired that shot, and saw the explosion of the shell that killed Bishop Polk, a former bishop of the Episcopal Church, then a major general, and he was killed right on the Confederate front line. I saw Gen. Jack Logan, mounted on that magnificent black horse, "Black Jack," after McPherson was killed in front of Atlanta, when Logan rallied the staggering battalions of our Army and saved the left wing. I saw Gen. Pat Claiborne at Franklin, mounted on a magnificent chestnut horse, in that fearful charge of November 30, 1864. I saw him ride diagonally across the line between the two armies. These were generals who led. Have you heard of any such gallant leadership in this great European war?

My time is limited, and I want to say a few words about this bill.

In my judgment, the item of $100,000 for medical examiners might be reduced. I am an economist on everything but pensions. [Laughter.] For instance, under the bill known as the Sherwood bill, the act of May 11, 1912, a soldier is pensioned on account of his service and his age. Disability has nothing to do with it. Now, 370,000 soldiers, in round numbers, have been pensioned under that law. What excuse is there for any medical examination for these 370,000 soldiers? They are on the pension roll not on account of disability but on account of their age and their service. There is no use making an argument on that proposition. It is apparent that they do not need any medical examination.

Who are the rest of the pensioned soldiers? Soldiers who lost an arm or a leg, and who are drawing pensions on account of that loss—pensions specifically provided for by law. They do not need any medical examination. I can not see what necessity there is for an appropriation of $100,000 for that purpose, and, with the consent of the chairman of the committee, I shall offer an amendment to reduce the amount to $25,000, thereby saving $75,000.

There is another characteristic of that war. Every soldier who stood behind the gun whether he wore the blue or the gray, knew what he was fighting for. The French soldier upon one side of the Rhine and the German soldier on the other side of the Rhine belong to the same class, but they do not either of them know what they are fighting for. The only excuse I ever saw was given by an Englishman, in a couplet, to show what he was fighting for:

My name is Tommy Atkins and I am a husky chap,
My comrade is a Cossack, and my partner is a Jap;
And with all the blooming virtues for which you know we shine,
We are carrying civilization to the people on the Rhine.

[Laughter and applause.]

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHERWOOD. I will.

Mr. AUSTIN. In regard to the $100,000 for medical examination, does not the gentleman think that the department may need that amount for the examination of soldiers who served in the Spanish-American War?

Mr. SHERWOOD. Very possibly that might be so.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Illinois if he wants to consume any time now on that side?

Mr. HINEBAUGH. I have no one ready to go on at this time.

Mr. BARTLETT. Has the gentleman any more Members who want to speak on that side?

Mr. HINEBAUGH. Oh, yes; there are quite a number of gentlemen.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CLINE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 21161, the pension appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

14. Letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report on preliminary examination and survey of Ohio River at or near Elizabethtown, Ill. (H. Doc. No. 1607); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. CLARK of Florida, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11694) providing for the construction of a public building at Binghamton, N. Y., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1401), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. PARK, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11291) for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building at Blytheville, Ark., reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1402), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland, from the Committee on Labor, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 12292) to prevent interstate commerce in the products of child labor, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1400); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. MONTAGUE, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 21315) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Suwanee River in the State of Florida, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1403), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. GOEKE, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7949) to authorize Parkersburg-Ohio Bridge Co., a corporation created and existing under the laws of the State of West Virginia, its successors and assigns, to construct a bridge acros the Ohio River from the city of Parkersburg, State of West Virginia, to the town of Belpre, State of Ohio, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1404), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. CANTRILL, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 20340) to increase the appropriation for a public building at Elkins, W. Va., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1406), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. DEITRICK, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 16223) for the relief of Warren V. Howard, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1405), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. STEPHENS of California: A bill (H. R. 21440) providing for the construction of naval auxiliaries and for their operation as merchant vessels in time of peace; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

By Mr. WEBB: A bill (H. R. 21441) to amend section 260 of the Judicial Code; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. FARR: A bill (H. R. 21442) authorizing the President of the United States to issue a provisional embargo upon wheat and wheat flour; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. COOPER: A bill (H. R. 21443) to reimburse owners of cattle exhibited at the National Dairy Show at Chicago, Ill., in November, 1914, and since then detained in said city because of the quarantine established by the United States Government; to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. PLATT: A bill (H. R. 21449) to regulate the filling of vacancies in the Corps of Cadets at the United States Military Academy not otherwise provided for by existing law, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. NORTON: A bill (H. R. 21450) to authorize an exchange of lands with the State of North Dakota for promotion of experiments in dry-land agriculture, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SUNDAY, February 14, 1915.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore [Mr. WALSH].

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We bless Thee, Almighty God, our heavenly Father, for the desire down deep in the human heart which inspires to intellectual, moral, and spiritual attainments which distinguishes men and fits them for leadership in the onward march of civilization, and for that appreciation which accords to others gratitude for those attainments.

We meet here to-day that we may render fitting tribute to a Member of this House who, though his service was cut short by the hand of death, has left a record worthy of such recognition by his faithful, intelligent service wherever he was called in State or national affairs. He has passed on to the great beyond, but still lives in his deeds and in the hearts of those who knew him. We thank Thee for that faith in the immortality of the soul which, through hope and love, enables us to look forward to a reunion of those we love, where all our longings, hopes, and aspirations may find their full fruition in a service to Thee. Be this our comfort and the comfort of those bound to him by the ties of kinship. May our lives be worthy of the tribute which is accorded to the faithful, in the name of Him who taught us how to live and to pass on with perfect faith in our God and our Father who doeth all things well. Amen.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the Journal.

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the Journal may be postponed until to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that the reading of the Journal be postponed until to-morrow. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read the special order.

THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE LEWIS J. MARTIN, OF NEW JERSEY.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. HART, by unanimous consent, Ordered, That Sunday, February 14, 1915, be set apart for addresses on the life, character, and public services of the Hon. LEWIS J. MARTIN, late a Representative from the State of New Jersey.

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Members may be permitted to print their remarks in the RECORD on the life, character, and public services of Hon. LEWIS J. MARTIN.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent that Members may have the privilege of printing their remarks in the RECORD on the life, character, and public services of Hon. LEWIS J. MARTIN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, I send to the Clerk's desk the following resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 735.

Resolved, That the business of the House be now suspended that opportunity may be given for tributes to the memory of Hon. LEWIS J. MARTIN, late a Member of this House from the State of New Jersey.

Resolved, That as a particular mark of respect to the memory of the deceased and in recognition of his distinguished public career the House, at the conclusion of these exercises, shall stand adjourned.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Resolved, That the Clerk send a copy of these resolutions to the family of the deceased.

The question was taken and the resolution was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, on the afternoon of May 6, 1913, Death, "always mysterious and unbidden," came to the Hon. LEWIS J. MARTIN.

He was of the sturdy New Jersey Sussex pioneers. The blood of the patriots of '76 coursing through his veins, and their spirit urging him to progressive effort, he directed a life of unusual versatility, more than half a century of which was devoted continuously to the public in official service.

His primary education was obtained in the public schools of Sussex (then the village of Deckertown), where he was born on the 22d day of February, 1844. He completed his studies at the Newton Collegiate Institute, a preparatory school of the county seat, in 1862.

In 1867 he was admitted to the bar of New Jersey, and became deputy county clerk, being appointed by his father, James J. Martin, the then county clerk. He succeeded his father upon his death in 1869. During this period he occupied also the office of town clerk of Newton.

In 1878 he was chosen to represent his county in the New Jersey House of Assembly, and was reelected in 1880 and 1881. In the last year he was appointed county law judge, retaining this office through three successive terms—for 15 years. In 1896 he was selected county counsel, which office he held for five years. Simultaneously he was elected and for eleven years remained a member of the Newton town committee, the governing body of his home town.

He returned to legislative work in 1897, representing his county in the New Jersey Senate from then until 1903. Four years of this term he was its minority leader.

During 1911 he was again appointed county law judge, where he displayed a superior judicial temperament. From then until his death he was frequently called to preside over important trials in other jurisdictions.

In 1912 he was elected a Member of this House, to represent the sixth district of New Jersey.

Such was the character of his official life. In the social and business affairs of the county he was of like prominence.

We will not think of him as "dead," but contemplate the transition with Colton:

> What we call life is a journey to death.
> And what we call death is a passport to life.

Sussex County was to Senator MARTIN not alone an abiding place—he loved it, and never ceased to regret his enforced absence from it. He once said that, descending the mountain pass through which the traveler from the east enters the Walkill, its first splendid valley, he enjoyed a peculiar sense of relief and homely quietness.

Delightful Sussex County—

> The hills, rock-ribbed and ancient as the sun;
> The vales, stretching in pensive quietness between—
> The venerable woods.

Its impress is upon the stranger who contemplates it. Its pastoral, yet stern quietness; its breadth of view—all these have influenced its sons.

And as "Senator" MARTIN loved old Sussex, so its people responded to him. It would be impossible to overestimate the extent of the attachment felt for him throughout the whole county; and his death seemed a household affliction to all who enjoyed his friendship.

Each one has some reminiscence of the "Senator," and the evidences of his kindness, his cordiality, are everywhere apparent. His urbanity of manner exerted a most remarkable power, winning the esteem and affection of all; but to those whom friendship suffered to look upon the inner sanctuary of his heart, there appeared a well of affection of unfathomable depth.

He was a man of strong, almost resistless, will, but never self-willed; of positive and clearly defined opinions, but not opinionated; open to conviction, ready to receive suggestions, and as ready to change his plans and opinions for any which might seem wiser and better. He abhorred the idea of stereotyping rules of feeling, thinking, or acting. He cordially disliked all narrowness, bigotry, and exclusiveness.

He needs no eulogy. The fact that he closed so remarkable and continuous a public life with every heart warmly attached to him, retaining throughout his life the warm regard and respect and admiration of his constituents, is a commentary on his worth more forcible than words.

We would sorrow, but we believe with Ingersoll that—

> Life is a narrow vale between the cold and barren peaks of two eternities. We strive in vain to look beyond the heights. We cry aloud, and the only answer is the echo of our wailing cry. From the voiceless lips of the unreplying dead, there comes no word; but in the night of death hope sees a star, and the listening love can hear the rustle of the wing.

He is not dead, but lives—with a "passport to life," he "left his body as an armor which fatigued him by its weight."

Mr. EAGAN. Mr. Speaker, one of the oldest customs of this House and at the same time one of the most beautiful is the holding of commemorative exercises, at which we pay our tributes of love and respect to the memory of our colleagues whom the grim destroyer has stricken down during their service in this body. Three weeks ago to-day we gathered in this Chamber to honor the memory of a great son of New Jersey. We have assembled to-day to honor the memory of another great Jerseyman, and our friend and colleague, LEWIS J. MARTIN, who represented the sixth congressional district of New Jersey.

New Jersey had the misfortune to have 2 of its 12 Members stricken down in the Sixty-third Congress. Mr. MARTIN died on May 6, 1913, and Mr. Bremner in February, 1914. By a strange coincidence both represented in this body a section of the State which until two years ago was included in the old sixth congressional district.

My acquaintance with LEW MARTIN did not begin until our election to Congress, but I had the good fortune in the very brief time that elapsed between the beginning of our service and his death to dwell under the same roof with him. This gave me the opportunity to spend a number of very pleasant evenings with him.

I was the last member of the New Jersey delegation to see him in life. We were together for a considerable time on the Friday afternoon and evening preceding his death. He was in the best of health and spirits on that occasion and neither of us had the slightest premonition when we parted on that evening that we were together for the last time in life. Little did I think that within three days I was to be called from this Chamber with several of my colleagues from New Jersey to identify his lifeless body in the Union Station.

Upon Congressman Bremner, who was destined to follow him within a short time into the great beyond, devolved the arrangements for the return of Judge MARTIN'S remains to Sussex County.

I can not speak of my colleague's congressional achievements because death came to him in the morning of his career in this House. That he would have made a worthy Representative of his district and his State in this body there can be no doubt.

Born in 1844 in the county of Sussex, of the sturdy old revolutionary stock of northern New Jersey, LEWIS J. MARTIN had the rare distinction of serving his town, his county, and his State for more than 50 years in many elective and appointive offices prior to his election to Congress in 1912. He was elected three times to the New Jersey Assembly, twice to the senate of our State, and was serving his fourth term as county judge when elected to Congress. That he gave vastly more in service than he received in monetary compensation is evidenced by the fact that he remained all his life a poor man.

Owing to his long service in the assembly and the senate, he was one of the most widely known men in New Jersey. There are few Jerseymen who have been active in either of the great political parties who did not count Judge MARTIN their friend. On more than one occasion the opportunity was presented to him to achieve high honors in his party outside of his native county, but his love for old Sussex and for the associations of a lifetime always had the greater lure for him. That Sussex reciprocated is evidenced by the many honors it bestowed upon him and by the love and respect with which his people always regarded him. On the day of his death business in his home town was suspended and thousands of lifelong neighbors and friends followed his remains to his last resting place.

Congressman MARTIN had a very attractive personality. Unassuming and rather retiring with strangers, he was the soul of good fellowship with his intimates. Although he had almost reached the allotted three score years and ten, he showed little evidence of advancing years. His more intimate associates were always men much younger than himself. It was evidently his intention to complete his public service with a single term in Congress. Many of his neighbors recall that in his speech in Sussex during the campaign of 1912 he said with a tinge of sadness in his voice that he would never call upon his friends to vote for him again.

LEW MARTIN was a good citizen, an honest and capable public servant, an able lawyer, and a just judge. He died when the sun of his influence and power was at its zenith, mourned by a legion of friends, the most devoted of whom were his lifelong neighbors.

Mr. Speaker, it is particularly to be regretted that it was impossible for the congressional committee to go to Mr. MARTIN'S home to pay the respect and the tribute of this House due to his remains and due his sorrowing family. The Members who were appointed on that committee will recall that the tariff bill was expected to come to a vote on the evening preceding the day of his burial. We had made all arrangements to go the moment the vote had been taken. A special train was kept waiting at the Union Station until the last minute. Unfortunately it was impossible for us to leave our duties in this House. I am sure I echo the sentiment of every Member of this House when I say that though we were not there in the flesh to pay our tribute of respect to our colleague, we were there at least in spirit. To them in their hour of sadness we extend our most heartfelt sympathy. Judge MARTIN, as I say, was a good citizen. To his family he has left the rich heritage of a good name.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. HART. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 21 minutes p. m.), in accordance with the resolution previously agreed to and under the order heretofore made, the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, Monday, February 15, 1915, at 11 o'clock a. m.

SENATE.

MONDAY, February 15, 1915.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, the all-wise, all-loving One, we come bringing to Thee the offering of our lives, adoration, worship, and praise. If there is among us wisdom in counsel, strength of deliberation, passion of brotherhood, it is because of Thy care for us. Thy grace has held us together to the great, high, common purpose of our national life. We pray for that highest achievement of our lives that all our activity may be brought to the test of our devotion to Thee and that religion may be the controlling and dominating passion of our hearts and minds. May it not be written of us that we have lost our place in the great onward progress of universal brotherhood because any of our leaders have lost their thought of God. Under Thine own guidance may we lead on to the accomplishment of Thy great plan for men. For Christ's sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday last was read and approved.

AMERICAN INSTRUCTORS OF THE DEAF.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the proceedings of the twentieth meeting of the convention of American Instructors of the Deaf, held at the Virginia School for the Deaf and the Blind, Staunton, Va., June 25–July 1, 1914. The communication and accompanying statement will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 21318) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also requested the return to the House of Representatives of the enrolled bill (S. 7555) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Suwanee River in the State of Florida.

LIMITATION OF DEBATE.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, in accordance with the rules of the Senate I desire to give notice of a proposed amendment to the rules. I ask that it may be read at the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the notice.

The Secretary read as follows:

In accordance with Rule XL of the Senate rules, I hereby give notice that on to-morrow I will propose an amendment to the rules of the Senate by adding thereto a new rule, to be known as Rule XLI, and to read as follows:

"Rule XLI. It shall be in order during the morning hour to make a motion that any bill or resolution then on the calendar shall be considered under the terms of this rule. Such motion when made shall lie over one day and shall then be decided without debate. No Senator shall be allowed to vote on a motion to consider a bill or resolution under this rule who is bound by any caucus or conference of Senators to vote in any particular way on said bill or resolution or any amendment thereon; but when any Senator's right to vote upon such motion is challenged such Senator shall be allowed to determine for himself whether he is disqualified from voting on said motion. When it has been decided to consider a bill or resolution under this rule the same shall first be considered in general debate, during which time no Senator, except by unanimous consent, shall be allowed to speak more than three hours. At the close of general debate the bill or resolution shall be read for amendments, and on any amendment that may be offered no Senator, except by unanimous consent, shall speak for more than 15 minutes: Provided, That any Senator who has not spoken for three hours in general debate shall, in addition to said 15 minutes, be allowed additional time; but in no case shall such additional time or times, including the time used by such Senator in general debate, exceed in the aggregate three hours: Provided further, That if unanimous consent for additional time is asked in behalf of any Senator, either during general debate or when the bill or resolution is being considered for amendment, and the same is refused, it shall be in order by motion to extend the time of such Senator for a time to be named in said motion, which motion shall be decided without debate. When the bill or resolution is being read for amendment all debate shall be confined to the amendment which is then pending.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of North Dakota, urging the passage of the so-called Sheppard-Hobson resolution relative to the sale, manufacture, and importation of intoxicating liquors, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Kansas, urging Congress to assist in establishing a system of subirrigation for the Cimarron River, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. LANE. I present a memorial of the Legislature of Oregon, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
STATE OF OREGON,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

I, Ben W. Olcott, secretary of state of the State of Oregon, and custodian of the seal of said State, do hereby certify that I have carefully compared the annexed copy of house joint memorial No. 4 with the original thereof filed in the office of the secretary of state of the State of Oregon on the 8th day of February, 1915, and that the same is a full, true, and complete transcript therefrom and of the whole thereof.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed hereto the seal of the State of Oregon.

Done at the capitol at Salem, Oreg., this 8th day of February, A. D. 1915.

House joint memorial No. 4.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America:

Your memorialists, the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, respectfully request that—

Whereas the Hon. David F. Houston, Secretary of Agriculture, in his report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914, recommends as follows:

"In regions where timber is the chief income-producing resource absence of demand for it often works a serious hardship upon those who have entered the region as the advance guard of civilization, and are seeking, in the face of many difficulties, to establish homes. There are counties in which a sparse local population of pioneer settlers find themselves surrounded by a wilderness largely consisting of national forest land, which is almost idle so far as any form of present use is concerned. In other words, a great, if not the greatest, of the potential sources of wealth in such counties, held in trust by the Government for the benefit of the public, not merely contributes nothing now to the upbuilding of the communities which will give value to the forests, but actually adds to the burden which these communities must assume. Were the national forests private property they would pay their fair proportion of the cost of road development, public schools, and other public activities through taxation. The Government, unlike the private owner of timberland in such regions, is holding the timber, not in order to make a profit later by its advance in value, but in order to make it promote the public welfare. That it should be made to serve the local as well as the national public welfare has been definitely recognized in the provisions of law for the use of 35 per cent of all gross receipts from the forests for local public purposes.

"To carry more fully into effect this already established principle a further step should be taken. It should not be necessary to wait until the period of hardest struggle is past before these public resources begin to assist local development. Before the national forests begin to yield large incomes, as well as after, they should be made to participate in the work of building up the country and giving value to all its resources.

"The first need of the public in undeveloped regions is for more and better roads. Without them the struggle of individuals to gain a foothold is much more difficult, while isolation from neighbors and the outside world means meager educational opportunity, a lack of comforts, and conditions unfavorable to community life. A road system, however, constitutes a capital investment which a handful of settlers must make, a little at a time. When their roads must be built largely through national-forest lands, which pay no taxes, their case is much more difficult. In such regions the Secretary of Agriculture should be authorized to make a study of the local conditions and to gather all the data necessary to formulate a plan for public-road development based on local needs. These plans should be carried into sufficient detail to provide a reasonably accurate estimate of the cost of the road construction which it is proposed that the Government undertake. They should be accompanied by careful and conservative appraisals of the value of the national-forest timber in each locality and a forecast of the future income which the forests will bring in from all sources. On the basis of the showings of fact regarding the value of the Government's property, its potential income-yielding capacity, and the needs of the public, Congress should be asked to appropriate for the construction of specific projects recommended by the Secretary of Agriculture. The cost of such road construction by the Government should constitute an advance of the amounts which the forests would later make available for local use. In effect, therefore, the roads would become an obligation upon the forests, to be extinguished as their resources come into commercial demand": Therefore be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That our Representatives and Senators in Congress be, and are hereby, memorialized and requested to use their best endeavors to see that the honorable the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to make a study of local conditions necessary to formulate plans for public-road development and to report his findings to Congress from time to time in accordance with his recommendations; be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state is hereby instructed to transmit by mail a copy of this resolution to each of the Oregon delegation in Congress.

Adopted by the house January 28, 1915.

Speaker of the House.

Mr. LANE. I present a memorial of the Legislature of Oregon, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
STATE OF OREGON,

House joint memorial No. 5.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, the Legislative Assembly of the State of Oregon, respectfully represent that—

Whereas there is pending in the Congress of the United States a bill entitled "A bill to increase the efficiency of the Organized Militia, and for other purposes" (S. 6217); and

Whereas the purpose of the law proposed by said bill is to provide for the payment of the Organized Militia of the United States; and

Whereas the state of the national defense requires that a more dependable military reserve be created than exists at the present time: Therefore be it

Resolved, That your memorialists do favor enactment of a Federal law providing for payment and reorganizing national reserve. That we do hereby declare that, in our opinion, the above-mentioned bill is designed to create such a dependable military reserve as is desired and to greatly increase the efficiency of the Organized Militia, and that it is necessary to the national welfare that the Congress of the United States shall, at the earliest possible date, pass the said act; and the Senators and Representatives in the Congress of the United States from the State of Oregon are hereby requested to aid and assist in the passage of said bill; and for the passage of such a law your memorialists will ever pray.

Adopted by the house January 28, 1915.

BEN SELLING,
Speaker of the House.

Adopted by the senate February 3, 1915.

W. LAIR THOMPSON,
President of the Senate.

(Indorsed:) House joint memorial No. 5. W. F. Drager, chief clerk. Filed February 8, 1915, at 2.45 o'clock p. m. Ben W. Olcott, secretary of state, by S. A. Kozer, deputy.

Mr. THOMPSON. I present a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Kansas, recommending the construction of demonstration plants in western Kansas to develop a system of subirrigation. I ask that it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from Kansas that an attested copy of the concurrent resolution was sent to the Chair and has been handed down by him this morning to be put in the RECORD.

Mr. THOMPSON. I should like to have the resolution read. It is a matter of some importance. I am perfectly familiar with the needs of the people in that section of the State in this regard.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to reading the resolution?

Mr. TOWNSEND. What is the request?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The request is to have read a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of Kansas in reference to subirrigation.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Did I understand the Chair to state that he has handed down a similar resolution?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has already been handed down. It was sent to the Chair.

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire not only that it shall appear in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, but that it may be read. This being a joint resolution passed by the legislature of my State, I regard it as the highest right and privilege that it be read upon request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It goes in the RECORD without reading. Is there objection to reading it? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution was read, as follows:

Senate concurrent resolution No. 24.

Be it resolved by the Senate of the State of Kansas (the House concurring therein) That—

Whereas the subject of subirrigation is of the most vital importance to many homesteaders now living on our arid lands; and

Whereas the freshets in the Cimarron River carry off annually, in destructive floods, millions of dollars' worth of precious water just at the season of the year when our crops are perishing for want of moisture; and

Whereas it is now claimed that by subirrigation with tiles its value may be multiplied from six to ten fold; and

Whereas our neighboring State of Oklahoma is likewise interested in these waters to a certain extent and is now preparing to appropriate the entire stream without regard to the natural, equitable, and constitutional rights of the State of Kansas therein; and

Whereas by the present activity of the said State in surveying ditches, attempting to appropriate the sites along the river already surveyed by the National Government, and by offering to throw open its "new college lands" to the public and impliedly conveying a promise of water rights to be supplied by water from the Cimarron River, an interstate stream, the interests of our community and State are imperiled and an emergency is created which, as a State, we are unable to cope with; and the only remedy promising a fair deal between the States is, as we believe, an equitable division of this property right by the National Government: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Kansas (the House concurring therein), That the Congress of the United States be requested and urged to take immediate steps for the construction of one or more demonstration plants on the west line of Kansas proving the economy of this form of irrigation, and consisting of and comprehending a reservoir at the aforementioned Government reservoir site at Garrett, Okla., a ditch leading therefrom to a system of subirrigation tile conduits leading out onto the arid lands lying on the highest general levels of Morton County, Kans.

The secretary of state is hereby instructed to send a certified copy of this resolution to each Member of the Kansas delegation in Congress and to the Speaker of the National House of Representatives and the Vice President of the United States to be laid before the Congress of the United States.

I hereby certify that the above concurrent resolution originated in the senate, and passed that body February 3, 1915.

W. Y. MORGAN,
President of the Senate.
BURT E. BROWN,
Secretary of the Senate.

Passed the house February 6, 1915.

ROBERT STONE,
Speaker of the House.
I. E. LAMBERT,
Chief Clerk of the House.

Approved February 10, 1915:

ARTHUR CAPPER, Governor.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. President, I wish to say in this connection, without taking up too much time of the Senate now, that I shall address myself later to this subject. I am perfectly familiar with it, having lived in this particular section of the State for years, and have observed the needs of the country in this respect. I regard the plan as entirely feasible, and heartily concur in the recommendations made by the legislature, and will do what I can to help carry out the suggestions made in the resolution in the way of securing proper national legislation on this subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

Mr. BRISTOW subsequently said: Mr. President, referring to the resolution from the Legislature of Kansas, which the Vice President handed down this morning, and in regard to which my colleague [Mr. THOMPSON] made some remarks, I desire to say that I have a bill pending now before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry which has been in that committee for something over a year covering the subject. I have been exceedingly anxious to get action from that committee, and have made every possible effort within my power and was assisted by the Senators from Nebraska last year to get legislation of a similar character; but, I regret to say, we were unable to obtain it. I am in hearty accord with the purpose of the resolution, and hope that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry may at least take some action this year.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I send to the desk and wish to have read a resolution in the nature of a petition of the Hattiesburg (Miss.) Commercial Club.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The Secretary read as follows:

HATTIESBURG, MISS., January 12, 1915.

Whereas the unfortunate and disastrous war in Europe has caused the withdrawal and destruction of about 20 per cent of the world's total ocean steam tonnage available and has caused an increase of ocean freight rates from 100 to 300 per cent for English, European, and Mediterranean ports, and those heavy advances constitute a heavy tax on southern producers, whether it be cotton, lumber, or naval stores, the three chief products of our Southern States; and as these ocean freight rates are still increasing and will continue to increase unless there is promptly organized and put in operation a merchant marine under the flag of the United States.

The Hattiesburg Commercial Club at their annual meeting on January 12, 1915, at the city of Hattiesburg, Miss., unanimously resolves:

1. That we heartily commend the action of our President and his Cabinet in their efforts to put on the statute books and appropriate the necessary money to build up a merchant marine to take care of American shippers and producers in their trade with foreign countries.

2. That we heartily and unanimously support the bill now before our Congress known as the ship-purchase bill.

3. That we request all Members of the House of Congress and our Senators from Mississippi to support, work, and vote for this worthy bill, believing that this is the only method to pursue which will secure reasonable ocean freight rates for exporting the products of our State and country at large.

4. That a copy of these resolutions be mailed to each Member of the House of Congress and Senators from Mississippi.

Signed by the president and secretary of the Hattiesburg Commercial Club on behalf of its entire membership.

T. C. HANNAH,
President Hattiesburg Commercial Club.
R. C. HAUENSTEIN,
Secretary Hattiesburg Commercial Club.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I present a letter in the nature of a petition signed by members of the Greenwood Business League of Mississippi, which I ask may be read, omitting the signatures.

There being no objection, the letter was read, omitting the signatures, as follows:

GREENWOOD, MISS., February 12, 1915.

Hon. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The undersigned merchants, cotton exporters, and business men of this city are heartily in favor of the emergency measure known as the ship-purchase bill and do hereby indorse same and believe it should be passed during the present session of Congress, without the necessity of an extra session.

Our advocacy of this measure is based partly on the following: Because we believe it will result in laying the foundation of an American merchant marine, the lack of which is now being so sorely felt by shippers of all kinds of commodities; it will result in freeing us from dependence upon foreign shipping lines, who are now ruthlessly breaking their contracts with American shippers, their freight rates charged being so exorbitant as to be almost piratical, robbing American commerce, particularly the South, in this hour of its commercial opportunity.

We also believe that the immediate passage of this measure would afford prompt relief to shippers in the reduction of ocean freight rates and result in the saving of millions of dollars to the business interests of our country.

Mr. McCUMBER. I present a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF NORTH DAKOTA,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

I, Thomas Hall, secretary of state of the State of North Dakota and keeper of the great seal thereof, hereby certify that the attached is a true and correct copy of a certain concurrent resolution adopted by the Fourteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of North Dakota, and the whole of such resolution.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State, at the capitol, in the city of Bismarck, this 10th day of February, A. D. 1915.

[SEAL.]

THOMAS HALL,
Secretary of State.

A concurrent resolution (McClellan).

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of North Dakota (the Senate concurring), That—

Whereas there are now in the western part of North Dakota about 673,000 acres of rough, broken, and nonirrigable vacant Government land more suitable for grazing and stock raising than for any other purpose; and

Whereas the steady development of the West has been dependent upon and built up by actual settlers and homesteaders who came West for the purpose of finding homes for the support and maintenance of themselves and families; and

Whereas the occupation and settlement of these vacant lands will in time, through taxation and other sources, inure to the benefit of the counties and whole country in which said lands are located; and

Whereas practically all the agricultural lands in the third congressional district of the State of North Dakota have been selected and are now occupied by actual settlers; and

Whereas the balance of the unoccupied lands are quite rough and broken and consist mostly of what are commonly known as the Bad Lands, and principally valuable for stock raising; and

Whereas there is a shortage of beef throughout the land as a result of stock raising having been neglected for agricultural pursuits; and

Whereas the balance of this land, if assigned in proper quantities, will yet support hundreds of families; and

Whereas we believe an act can and should be passed by Congress which will grant each settler a sufficient acreage of said lands as will comfortably support a family by mixed farming and stock raising thereon, and which act might be drafted along the line of the 640-acre stock-raising homestead bill No. 15799, which was introduced during the second session of the Sixty-third Congress of the United States, and in which there is incorporated a classification clause which would leave absolutely no grounds for the act to monopolize lands coming under the 160-acre or 320-acre acts; and

Whereas it has come to our notice that a movement was on foot to have Congress pass a law to have said Government lands granted to the State for leasing purposes, and to also pass a national leasehold bill; and

Whereas we believe that such an act would be a crime and an outrage perpetrated upon the counties in which said lands are situated, and would deprive them of the actual settlers and families which they would otherwise get and would further deprive such counties of the assessable valuations and taxable property which they are entitled to and from which said counties would eventually realize an abundance of revenue by virtue of entrymen having their lands patented and homes built thereon for themselves and families and their children's children; and

Whereas there is not the incentive for families to build up valuable and permanent homes on rented land that there is on land they can call their own, and from which they would not have to be separated by virtue of the expiration of a lease; and

Whereas there are a number of the counties in which this land is located that are already too small in the area of their agricultural lands without robbing them of what is left, and this is especially true of Billings County, which has not any more taxable real estate than it needs for the running of their county government; and

Whereas we do not believe in heaping the burdens of taxation on the few who happen to own the agricultural land in such localities when the same can be reduced with the settlement of these vacant Government lands by homesteaders who are willing to share the burden of taxation in their community for the purpose of getting homes; and

Whereas we are heartily in favor of some act that will tend to improve said district and bring settlers who will make permanent homes therein, but that we are bitterly opposed to the submission of a national leasehold bill, or any act that will shut the lands out from actual homesteading, thereby curtailing and handicapping the development and upbuilding of said district: Now therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of North Dakota (the Senate concurring), That we transmit a copy of this resolution to our Senators and Representatives in the National Congress, requesting and urging them to use all honorable means to see that the spirit of this resolution be put into execution as far as possible, and that any act which would tend to prevent the actual settlement of the lands above referred to, and which would deprive any county in said third congressional district of the full benefit of its lands through taxation or otherwise, be prevented: It is further

Resolved, That the Secretary of State is hereby authorized to transmit the foregoing resolution to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of North Dakota.

A. P. HANSON,
Speaker of the House.
ALBERT N. WOLD,
Chief Clerk of the House.
J. H. FRAINE,
President of the Senate.
M. J. GEORGE,
Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. I present a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of North Dakota, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There being no objection, the concurrent resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE OF NORTH DAKOTA,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

I, Thomas Hall, secretary of state of the State of North Dakota, and keeper of the great seal thereof, hereby certify that the attached is a true and correct copy of a certain concurrent resolution adopted by the Fourteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of North Dakota, and the whole of such resolution.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State, at the capitol, in the city of Bismarck, this 10th day of February, A. D. 1915.

[SEAL.]

THOMAS HALL,
Secretary of State.

A concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives of the State of North Dakota, the Senate concurring (Everson).

Whereas the Sheppard-Hobson resolution amending the Constitution of the United States so as to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors and beverages failed to receive the necessary two-thirds vote in the House of Representatives of Congress; and

Whereas a majority of the Members of said House of Representatives voted in favor of the resolution, among them the Representatives from North Dakota; and

Whereas Federal legislation is necessary to properly regulate and control the liquor traffic: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of North Dakota (the Senate concurring therein), That we commend the action of our Representatives in Congress in voting for the Sheppard-Hobson resolution, and urge them to continue to work for the passage of the same;

Resolved, That we urge the Senate and the House of Representatives of Congress to reconsider the action already taken and to pass the said Sheppard-Hobson resolution; and be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state be instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to our Senators and Representatives in Congress, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to the Vice President, and to the President of the United States.

A. P. HANSON,
Speaker of the House.
ALBERT N. WOLD,
Chief Clerk of the House.
J. H. FRAINE,
President of the Senate.
M. J. GEORGE,
Secretary of the Senate.

Mr. POMERENE. I have a number of telegrams in the nature of memorials from postal clerks in various cities of my State remonstrating against a change from annual to biennial promotions for the men in that service. I ask that the telegrams may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

CHICAGO JUNCTION, OHIO, February 10, 1915.

Senator ATLEE POMERENE,
Washington, D. C.:

The 10 railroad postal clerks of Chicago Junction, Ohio, respectfully ask you to oppose the change from annual to biennial promotion for the men of the service.

E. W. BROWN, Branch President.

Mr. CULBERSON. I present a number of telegrams in the nature of memorials from citizens of El Paso, Tex., from 150 members of Branch 1152, United National Association of Post Office Clerks, of Dallas, Tex., and from 10,000 members of trade unions in Fort Worth, Tex., which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EL PASO, TEX., February 13, 1915.

Hon. CHARLES A. CULBERSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Understand that committee on Post Office appropriation has recommended a reduction of wages of post-office employees, and on behalf of the citizens of El Paso I protest against the same. Use your influence to see that the bill does not pass.

C. E. KELLY, Mayor.

EL PASO, TEX., February 13, 1915.

Hon. CHARLES A. CULBERSON,
Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

Understand that committee on Post Office appropriation has recommended a reduction of wages of post-office employees, and on behalf of my friends in Postal Service I respectfully protest against same. Please use your influence to see that the bill does not pass.

WM. H. BURGES.

DALLAS, TEX., February 13, 1915.

Hon. CHARLES A. CULBERSON,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

The 150 members Branch 1152, United National Association Post-Office Clerks, most earnestly request you to oppose Post Office appropriation bill recommended by Senate committee; support bill passed by House with all amendments; especially oppose biennial promotions; support section 9 and Madden supervisor employees' reclassification bills.

JEFF SMITH, Corresponding Secretary.

FORT WORTH, TEX., February 14, 1915.

Hon. CHARLES A. CULBERSON,
Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Ten thousand members of trades-unions in Fort Worth represented in trades assembly, citizens of Texas and United States, urgently request vote against Senate amendment to House Post Office appropriation bill providing biennial instead of annual promotions, in view of fact in recent years both Army and Navy terms of service for promotion have been lowered, when cost of living has advanced to such abnormal degree it appears to us reversal of American policy and unworthy innovation in peace-loving democratic government to propose longer terms for civil service while shortening that of military.

H. O. GOSSETT, President.
R. W. WALKER, Secretary.

FORT WORTH, TEX., February 13, 1915.

Senator CULBERSON, Washington, D. C.:

In behalf of the members of the local organizations of postal employees in mass meeting assembled, consisting of National Association of Letters Carriers, United National Association of Post Office Clerks, Railway Mail Clerks, and National Federation of Post Office Clerks, comprising a membership of 400, we ask that your earnest efforts be made to eliminate from the postal appropriation bill now pending before the Senate the amendments which abolish the annual promotions for efficient clerks, carriers, and railway mail clerks.

If this Senate committee amendment prevails it will mean that hereafter postal employees in the automatic grades from $800 to $1,200 must wait two years for each $100 promotion, or eight years, exclusive of substitute service, before reaching the maximum grade. This is manifestly unfair to the deserving, hard-working men in the lower salary grades, and, if adopted, it will operate to demoralize the efficiency of the service by making impossible the prompt and proper recognition due to faithful, conscientious works.

Mr. PENROSE. I present a number of telegrams in the form of memorials from railway postal clerks in the State of Pennsylvania, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

5338 CHESTNUT STREET,
Philadelphia, Pa., February 4, 1915.

Hon. BOIES PENROSE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In the Post Office appropriation bill for the year 1915–16 it is contemplated by the department to make promotions biennially instead of annually, as at present time, based, I understand, on the idea that clerks reach the maximum salary too quickly; and, while this would be to a certain extent true, it would be a very great injustice to a great many clerks who were in the service a long time prior to the present promotion law and who, like myself, are now due at the next promotion period to receive the final promotion due us and for which we have faithfully worked and confidently expected, and the character of our work and the scope of our distribution is exactly on the same basis as the clerks who have already received their final promotion.

I sincerely hope you will lend your aid to us in this matter if you can see your way clear to do so, for you have in the past done many things for our line (the New York and Pittsburgh railway post office) for which we all hold you in grateful remembrance.

I think I am clearly within my right under the "right of petition," as I would not wish to violate any principle of the service in thus addressing you, and trust that we may not be denied the fruits of our labor which is justly due us. Thanking you very much, I am,

Very truly, yours,

W. J. POORMAN,
New York and Pittsburgh Railway Post Office.

PHILADELPHIA, PA., February 5, 1915.

Senator PENROSE,
Washington, D. C.:

Philadelphia post-office clerks urge you to support annual promotions which was enacted into law while you were chairman of the committee.

WILLIAM H. HART,
President Clerks' Association.

Mr. BURTON. I present a joint resolution of the Legislature of Ohio, relative to the seamen's bill, which I ask may be read.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was read, as follows:

Senate joint resolution No. 8.

Joint resolution—Memorial to Congress relative to protection of passenger and shipping interests on the high seas and Great Lakes.

Whereas there is now pending before the Congress of the United States two proposed measures purporting to be for the betterment of the conditions of sailors and the advancement of safety at sea; and

Whereas the most marked requirements of the proposed measures seem formulated to meet conditions existing, or supposed to exist, in sea commerce, but which are made applicable to all merchant vessels exceeding 100 tons, including the Great Lakes; and

Whereas the proposed measures are made applicable to ocean and lake vessels, without differentiation on account of location, trade routes, or manner of conducting business: Therefore be it

Resolved by the senate and the house of the Eighty-first General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That, without assuming to know as much of the general situation as Congress, we express our belief, nevertheless, that the best interests of the passengers and seamen, and of the trading and shipping public, can be conserved by exempting the Great Lakes from any measures which Congress may, in its wisdom, adopt at this time applying to ocean traffic, and that if any regulations are deemed necessary for the Lakes that they only be enacted after separate consideration of the special conditions surrounding the vessels and trade of the Great Lakes.

Be it further resolved, That the secretary of the State of Ohio is hereby instructed to forthwith transmit certified copies of this resolution to all Ohio Members of the Senate and House of Representatives of Congress of the United States, and the clerks of these respective bodies, at Washington, D. C.

CHAS. D. CONOVER,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
JOHN H. ARNOLD,
President of the Senate.

Adopted February 11, 1915.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
STATE OF OHIO,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

I, C. Q. Hildebrant, secretary of state of the State of Ohio, do hereby certify that the foregoing is an exemplified copy, carefully compared by me with the original enrolled resolution now in my official custory as secretary of state, and found to be true and correct, of senate joint resolution No. 8, adopted by the General Assembly of Ohio February 11, 1915, and filed in this office on the 12th day of February, A. D. 1915.

Witness my hand and official seal, at Columbus, this 12th day of February, A. D. 1915.

[SEAL.]

C. Q. HILDEBRANT,
Secretary of State.

Mr. BURTON. I present a petition signed by the mayor, City Council, and the Board of Trade of Put in Bay, Ohio, praying for the adoption of an amendment providing that transportation on the Great Lakes be excepted from the provisions of the so-called seamen's bill. I move that the petition lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BURTON presented petitions of sundry citizens of Ohio, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the exportation of ammunition, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. JONES. I present two telegrams, from John P. Kiggins, Clarke County commander Grand Army of the Republic, of Vancouver, and from Frank Dye, commander of Vancouver, Wash., relative to the War Department substitute in the Army appropriation bill, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegrams were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

VANCOUVER, WASH., February 14, 1915.

Senator WESLEY L. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

War Department substitute for Madden-Chamberlain bill has my strongest approbation; also numerous of our friends. A measure of its kind, that does not cost Government a cent and releases worthy employees of their yoke, is to be commended. Urgently request your strongest influence to keep the measure in present appropriation bill until its passage.

JOHN P. KIGGINS,
Clarke County Commander.

VANCOUVER, WASH., February 14, 1915.

Senator WESLEY L. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

War Department substitute in Army appropriation bill for Madden-Chamberlain bill reclassifying clerks and messengers mobile army has received strongest approval Camp Barlow, Spanish War Veterans. Proposed legislation equitable and just; does not cost Government cent; does benefit numerous superannuated employees, some of whom are our members. We urge upon you and other Members Washington representatives your strongest influence to pass this measure, and in the Army appropriation bill.

FRANK DYE, Commander.

Mr. JONES. I present a telegram in the nature of a memorial from 150 railway postal clerks in western Washington, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SEATTLE, WASH., February 14, 1915.

WESLEY L. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

One hundred and fifty railway postal clerks in western Washington respectfully ask you to oppose the change from annual to biennial promotions for the men of this service.

A. W. LEONARD, Branch President.

Mr. OWEN. I present a resolution adopted by the House of Representatives of the Fifth Legislature of the State of Oklahoma, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD. It memorializes for the passage of the ship-purchase bill.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

House resolution 17, by Abney.

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the Fifth Legislature of the State of Oklahoma, That our United States Senators be, and they are hereby, memorialized to pass the ship-purchase bill at the earliest possible date to avoid calling an extra session of Congress.

Adopted by the house of representatives February 10, 1915.

A. MCCRORY,
Speaker House of Representatives.

Mr. NELSON presented petitions of sundry citizens of Minnesota, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the exportation of ammunition, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Minnesota, praying for the exclusion of certain matter from the mail, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. WORKS. I present a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California, relative to a request to the Secretary of the Interior for permission to take elk from the Yellowstone National Park for transportation to and liberation in the coast range mountains in the county of San Luis Obispo, State of California, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Assembly joint resolution 18 (by Mr. E. S. Rigdon, of fifty-third district) relative to a request to the Secretary of the Interior for permission to take elk from the Yellowstone National Park for transportation to and liberation in the coast range mountains in the county of San Luis Obispo, State of California.

Whereas the wild animal life of California has become almost extinct, this being especially true as to wild animals having a food value; and

Whereas the transporting and liberating of elk in California has heretofore been successfully undertaken; and

Whereas citizens of the county of San Luis Obispo, in the State of California, have signified their willingness to bear the expense of the transportation of elk to be liberated in the San Lucia coast range mountains of the said county: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Assembly and Senate of California, jointly, That we respectfully urge and request the Secretary of the Interior of the United States to consent to and arrange for the taking of 60 head of elk from the Yellowstone National Park to be transported at an appropriate season to the State of California, to be liberated in the mountains of San Luis Obispo County; and be it further

Resolved, That the chief clerk of the assembly be, and he is hereby, instructed to forward a copy of this resolution to Hon. Franklin K. Lane, Secretary of the Interior of the United States, to each of the Senators from California in the United States Congress, and to the Hon. E. A. HAYES, Representative in Congress from the eighth district of California.

C. C. YOUNG,
Speaker of the Assembly.
L. B. MALLORY,
Chief Clerk of the Assembly.

Received by the governor this 30th day of January, A. D. 1915.

ALEXANDER MCCABE,
Private Secretary to the Governor.

Mr. OLIVER presented memorials of sundry citizens of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the proposed change in the present system of promotion of postal clerks, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LODGE presented a petition of the Men's Club, of Cohasset, Mass., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the interstate shipment of the products of child labor, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of the executive committee of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, of Boston, Mass., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to prohibit the intermarriage of white and colored people in the District of Columbia, which aws referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a petition of the city council of Salem, Mass., praying for the enactment of legislation to grant pensions to civil-service employees, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. DU PONT presented petitions of sundry citizens of Wilmington, Del., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the exportation of ammunition, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. POINDEXTER presented petitions of Otto Hansen, of Spokane; William Haw, of Endicott; C. H. Kimpel, of Kennewick; Peter H. Peters, of Fairfield; John J. Jaeger, of Spanaway; and Carl W. Wagner, of Hillyard, all in the State of Washington, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the exportation of ammunition, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. KERN presented petitions of sundry citizens of Fort Wayne, St. Meinrad, Hessville, Hammond, and Indianapolis, all in the State of Indiana, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the exportation of ammunition, etc., which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of Local Branch, United Mine Workers, of Newburg, Ind., praying for the extension of the work of the Bureau of Mines, which was referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining.

He also presented a memorial of the congregation of the Grace Presbyterian Church, of Indianapolis, Ind., remonstrating against the exclusion of certain matter from the mail, which was ordered to lie on the table.

SHIP RATES ON TOBACCO.

Mr. JAMES. I present an article from the Louisville (Ky.) Courier Journal, relative to a discussion had at a meeting at Nashville, Tenn., of the Planters' Protective Association of Tennessee and Kentucky, on the state of tobacco, which I ask to have read.

There being no objection, the article was read as follows:

SHIP RATES ON TOBACCO ALMOST PROHIBITIVE—SAID TO HAVE GONE FROM 32 CENTS THE 100 POUNDS TO $3.30 SINCE WAR BEGAN.

NASHVILLE, TENN., February 12.

The question of securing ships to transport American tobacco abroad was discussed to-day at a meeting here of the Planters' Protective Association of Tennessee and Kentucky. It was stated that the present rate on tobacco was virtually prohibitory, having grown from 32 cents the hundred pounds to $3.50, and that shipping facilities were almost unobtainable at any price.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. FLETCHER. I send to the desk, and desire to have read, a clipping from a newspaper published in Tacoma, State of Washington, which has been sent to me by a correspondent, bearing on the subject of our merchant marine. It is not very long, and I think it will throw some light from the Pacific coast on the situation.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

EXORBITANT RATES BEING CHARGED FOR SHIPS.

Large profits are being made by the shipowner in carrying wheat to Europe. Vessel owners are demanding and getting big rates. Before the war broke out owners were satisfied with $250 per day, and making money. Now they charge as high as $1,500 per day for their vessels. One of the biggest rates so far given a vessel to carry wheat is that of the Lowther Castle, to load at Portland. The rate is 65 shillings.

Speaking of this rate, a well-posted shipping man Monday declared:

"The Lowther Castle, after allowing for bunker coal to take her through the canal to an Atlantic coaling port, will carry 6,700 long tons. At this rate the steamer will earn for her voyage about $104,520.

"The time consumed by a vessel making this trip is about 50 days, while 10 days may be taken for loading and lining the ship. So that for 70 days the owners will get for the vessel $1,500 per day. As a vessel like the Lowther Castle could be obtained for $250 per day before the war, it is seen that the shipowners are not losing money.

"Two years ago a vessel could be purchased for $200,000, and some of the interned German vessels can now be purchased for this. In one or two voyages the vessel has paid for itself."

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. We have had very many communications from boards of trade and chambers of commerce in protest against the so-called shipping bill. I have here a communication from the Locomotive Firemen and Engineers, a very intellectual and highly qualified organization, as we all know, advocating the passage of that bill. Accompanying it is a leaflet from the magazine known as the Locomotive Engineers' Magazine in support of that measure. I desire to present the communication and leaflet, and ask that they may be incorporated in the RECORD without reading.

Mr. BURTON. I have no special sensitiveness in regard to that article. I see it contains a personal attack upon myself——

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I read the article and am conscious of the fact to which the Senator from Ohio refers, and have stricken out that reference and everything in the nature of a personal attack.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I think as compared with the three tailors of Tooley Street it is an exhibition of a memorial showing absolute lack of any understanding of the subject. If it is the desire of the Senate to load the RECORD with these articles, which are written by persons entirely unfamiliar with the subject, I am not going to object.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I will say, Mr. President, that I have stricken out the objectionable part; I realize that that should be done, and I would not be a party to or be guilty of anything that would malign a Senator on this floor, and with the permission of the Senate I will withdraw my request. However, inasmuch as we have had protests from the great organized interests and wealth against the bill, it seemed only fit and proper that those in the minor walks of life who might have something to say should be heard. Therefore I will withdraw the request with the consent of the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The matter is withdrawn.

Mr. GALLINGER. I desire to ask the Senator from New Jersey if he also withdrew the communication from the organization to which he referred?

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I have withdrawn the entire matter.

Mr. GALLINGER. I notice that they say there are 3,000,000 people out of employment in the United States, and I rather wanted that to go in the RECORD.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Well, the Senator from New Jersey takes that with a grain of salt, of course.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The entire matter is withdrawn by the Senator from New Jersey.

SUWANEE RIVER BRIDGE, FLORIDA.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the request of the House of Representatives to return to the House the enrolled bill (S. 7555) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Suwanee River, in the State of Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. I did not quite understand that, my attention being diverted at the time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the request of the House of Representatives.

The SECRETARY. The House of Representatives requests the return of the enrolled bill (S. 7555) for the construction of a bridge across the Suwanee River in the State of Florida.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I should like to know just what that situation is. The Senate passed the bill, but I did not know that there was an enrolled bill here. I should like to look into the matter before any further action is taken.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The matter will lie over.

Mr. ROOT. I should like to inquire what disposition was made of the matter last before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No disposition was made of it.

Mr. ROOT. It lies on the table, I suppose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It lies on the table until called up.

Mr. FLETCHER subsequently said: With reference to the resolution from the House, there seems to have been some mistake regarding that bill, and I move that the Senate concur in the request of the House of Representatives.

Mr. ROOT. We can not hear the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from Florida is to concur in the request of the House for the return of the enrolled bill. The Chair is informed, without certifying to the truth of the information, that the bill failed to pass the House.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, would it not be in order, and the proper way to proceed, for the Senator from Florida to ask the Senate to reconsider the vote by which the bill passed the Senate? The bill passed the Senate by unanimous consent on Friday last, as I remember.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not think so. I understand that the situation is that instead of sending over to the House the Senate bill as it passed the Senate, they sent over what appeared to be an enrolled bill, and it was not an enrolled bill at all, because it had not passed both Houses. They simply want to get this copy of the enrolled bill out of the way, and then they will take up the Senate bill. There is no objection to it; there is simply a mistake in certifying as an enrolled bill a bill that had passed only one body. It is just a clerical mistake; that is all.

Mr. SMOOT. I may be mistaken, but as I remember last Friday the House sent a message to the Senate, and in that message it included the bill referred to. When the bill was handed down to the Senate, the Senator from Florida asked unanimous consent for its immediate consideration, and that consent was given, and the bill passed.

Mr. FLETCHER. No; the Senator is mistaken. The bill that was considered and passed by the Senate was reported by the committee, and it was a Senate bill, and therefore the error has occurred. It has been certified as an enrolled bill, whereas really it was a Senate engrossed bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida that the Senate comply with the request of the House for the return of the enrolled bill.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. OWEN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 4619) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to vacate certain lands in Oklahoma reserved for a town site, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 985) thereon.

Mr. CLAPP, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 7179) to provide for the establishment of a forest reserve within the Red Lake Indian Reservation, Minn., reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 984) thereon.

Mr. ASHURST, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 7652) providing for the continuance of the Joint Committee to Investigate Indian Affairs, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 983) thereon.

PURCHASE OF SHIPS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am directed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate to report back favorably, with two amendments, a resolution (S. Res. 543) submitted Saturday last, I believe, by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], and I call his attention to the report. I shall ask immediate consideration for the matter, and before submitting it to the Senate, and immediately after the resolution with the amendments is read, retaining the floor for that purpose, I shall explain why the amendments were ingrafted upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendments reported by the committee.

The SECRETARY. The committee proposes the following amendments:

4. What efforts the so-called Shipping Trust or any person, firm, or corporation engaged or interested in shipping have, directly or indirectly, made to prevent the passage of S. 6356, commonly known as the ship-purchase bill; whether any company of shipowners or chamber of commerce or other body influenced by or dominated by shipowners whose vessels would compete with the ships to be purchased or constructed under said act have had attorneys or lobbyists at Washington working to consummate the defeat of the said bill, and whether any Senator or Senators of the United States are stock owners or bondholders of the United Fruit Co., or of any other company owning ships, which would compete with the ships to be purchased or constructed under the provisions of said bill.

5. That the said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, be authorized to employ a stenographer, at a price not to exceed $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with the subject pending before the said committee; that the committee may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate, and the expenses thereof shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the resolution.

Mr. GALLINGER. Have the proposed amendments been read?

The VICE PRESIDENT. They have been read. The question is on agreeing to the amendments of the committee.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I may say, as the author of the resolution, that I have no objection to the proposed amendments. I think we should have the fullest and freest investigation. They might have been included in the original resolution.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I believe I have the floor, Mr. President.

Mr. BURTON. Will the Senator from Mississippi yield to me for a moment? I think it will facilitate matters.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield for a question.

Mr. BURTON. The inquiries that I made were in regard to substantive transactions. These are amendments which pertain to investigations as to influences brought to bear, possibly, against the bill. These latter would naturally go to a committee which has already become, if not a standing committee of the Senate, one that is practically permanent, for the investigation of the lobby, and my fear is that this will postpone action. However, I do not feel like objecting.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If I yield for a speech, I fear I may lose my place on the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want, in explanation of the resolution, to say this: The Senator from Ohio submitted a resolution which carried with it certain intimations or insinuations or suggestions, whatever you may choose to call them, of corrupt influences behind the support of this bill. The parties at whom he struck indicated to the committee their desire that the matter should be investigated at the very first possible moment, so that any sort of insinuation of that sort might not hang long in face of the proof that will undoubtedly be presented. The majority of the committee took the position that if we were going to examine into the question as to whether there was rottenness on one side of this Denmark we had better see whether there was any on the other side or not; and we concluded it would be but right, while we were examining into the suggestions or intimations of the Senator from Ohio, to examine into the truthfulness or falsity of other insinuations and intimations that had been going around.

As for myself, if the matter had been left to me entirely, and it were my good fame that had been affected instead of somebody else's, I would have taken no notice of either side of the controversy without some definite and specific charge made upon this floor; but since the Senator from Ohio chose to put out a dragnet we thought the dragnet ought to be large enough and strong enough to catch all possible fish of the character struck at by him, if there were any fish of that sort. We therefore amended the resolution so that it shall apply to the entire question of the alleged, intimated, suggested, insinuated corruption on either side of this great question, with the hope that in behalf of the good name of this body and the good name of the American people it may result in demonstrating the fact that there is no corruption on either side. I say that by way of expressing my own opinion.

I want to say this generally about dragnet investigations: This investigation struck at the Secretary of the Treasury. We might just as well be frank about it. That was what was meant by it. The Senator from Ohio is no more urgent for an immediate investigation and immediate production of evidence and proof than is the Secretary of the Treasury. Although in its terms it was general, everybody rather understood that it was striking at him and at a member of the reserve board of our banking system. At any rate, the newspapers said that was what was struck at, and I suppose they had come pretty near it, as they usually do.

Speaking generally, however, and independently of this question, which was made specific by those newspaper articles, it seems to me that the Senate of the United States ought to get out of the habit, into which it has gotten into lately, of making a grand jury of itself and of spreading around fish nets, I might say, and going into an inquisitorial investigation upon grounds that no court of chancery would admit, or anybody else, where no specific, decisive, explicit charges of any sort are made upon the floor. But the parties struck at by this resolution do not want to rest under the intimation of silence for one day; and therefore, although the Senator introduced the resolution upon Saturday, I called the committee together this morning, so that there might be quite enough investigation to satisfy everybody.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I desire to state that I did not have the Secretary of the Treasury especially in mind in introducing this resolution. There have been statements made on the floor of this body that certain financial or banking firms have made loans on these ships that are in our ports, and that there were options as well, and it might be well to investigate whether any officials of the Government, the Secretary of the Treasury, or other officials, have been in communication with them; but that was not the primary object of the resolution. If it had been aimed especially at the Secretary of the Treasury, I am not sure but that action might have been taken under an almost forgotten statute—that of 1789, creating the Treasury Department.

It is to be noted that the statutes organizing the different departments sever out the Treasury Department and the Secretary of the Treasury from all the rest. He can be called before either House of Congress by a resolution under this provision, which is found in section 248 of the Revised Statutes:

> The Secretary of the Treasury shall from time to time digest and prepare plans for the improvement and management of the revenue and for the support of the public credit, shall superintend the collection of the revenue, shall from time to time prescribe the forms of keeping and rendering all public accounts and making returns——

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. For what purpose does the Senator rise?

Mr. REED. I rose for two reasons. In the first place, it is impossible to hear the Senator from Ohio, and, secondly, I desire to inquire what citation from the statutes he is reading?

Mr. BURTON. Section 248 of the Revised Statutes. I will try to make myself heard, especially when I come to the vital portion [reading]— > shall grant, under the limitations herein established or to be hereafter provided all warrants for moneys to be issued from the Treasury in pursuance of appropriations by law, "shall make report and give information to either branch of the legislature in person or in writing, as may be required," respecting all matters referred to him by the Senate or House of Representatives or which shall appertain to his office, and generally shall perform all such services relative to the finances as he shall be directed to perform.

I can not believe that any opposition to this resolution for an investigation or to the other resolution which comes over from yesterday proceeds from the Secretary of the Treasury. If he were asked to appear here, I have no doubt he would conduct himself ably and well and to the entire satisfaction of the Senate, and that if Senate resolution 542, which comes over from Saturday, is brought up and passed, as I trust it will be, he will also give an answer which will illuminate this subject and do full justice to his own connection or possible connection with the pending bill.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I can say to the Senator from Ohio that he need not disturb his soul over the question of any opposition on the part of the Secretary of the Treasury to either of his resolutions. He can compose himself in absolute peace upon that proposition. The Secretary of the Treasury will not only respond to any request from Congress but he will welcome any sort of investigation that the Senate desires to inaugurate. Indeed, Mr. President, he has always been so willing to furnish information that it was utterly unnecessary for the Senator from Ohio or anybody else to introduce a resolution calling for information. Much less was it necessary or proper to introduce these resolutions which, in effect, reflect upon the Secretary of the Treasury, and which, in my judgment, were intended to reflect upon him.

I make that statement because the Secretary of the Treasury has been willing at all times to give to the Senator from Ohio or to any other Senator any information in his possession. The innuendo that is contained in these resolutions is one which I think never ought to be made on the floor of this body or in public speech or private conversation against an honorable gentleman, unless the maker of the resolution or the author of the insinuation is willing to state that he has substantial evidence warranting the attitude he assumes. I do not regard it as a light thing to introduce into the Senate such a resolution.

I want to read to the Senate the resolutions of the Senator from Ohio.

> Whereas the pending ship-purchase bill, being S. 6856, contemplates by certain of its provisions the purchase of shipping tonnage already constructed, and therefore suggests the possible acquisition of ships belonging to belligerents, some of which are interned in American and other ports as the result of the war; and
>
> Whereas the purchase of such vessels would raise questions of vital importance to the interests of the United States, a knowledge of which is of supreme importance in order that the Senate may reach an intelligent conclusion as to the advisability of enacting said bill and as to the propriety of incorporating in its provisions certain amendments: Therefore be it
>
> Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested, and is hereby directed, to transmit, at his earliest convenience, to the Senate of the United States information responsive to the following queries:
>
> First. Has the Secretary of the Treasury knowledge that any officer of the Government has made overtures or addressed inquiries to the owners of ships under the flags of belligerent nations, including those ships now detained in ports of the United States or other neutral ports, with a view to the purchase of such ships on the part of the Government of the United States or any of its authorized agencies?
>
> Second. Have tenders of sale of any merchant ship or ships carrying the flag of any of the belligerent nations been made to the United States or any of its officers or agencies?
>
> Third. Have there been any tenders for the sale of vessels at present carrying the flag of any neutral nation to the United States or any responsible officer or agent thereof?
>
> Fourth. Is it within the knowledge of the Secretary of the Treasury that any individual, firm, or corporation in the United States has made loans or advances to any individual, firm, or corporation owning ships which are detained in the ports of the United States or elsewhere to avoid the consequences of war; or that any person, firm, or corporation, acting either in private capacity or that of agent for the Government, holds an option on any such ship or ships, contemplating their transfer either to the Government of the United States, an agency thereof, or to private citizens of the United States?
> Fifth. Is it within the knowledge of the Secretary of the Treasury that the Government of the United States, or any official thereof, has in his employ or under his direction any person or agent who is making inquiry as to the possibility of purchasing any ship or ships of any description whatsoever, contemplating their eventual transfer to the United States or an agency thereof?
> In each of the above instances the names of the persons, ships, and terms involved in each contemplated sale or purchase is requested.

That is followed by a resolution introduced at substantially the same moment, reading:

> Resolved, That a committee of five Senators be appointed by the Presiding Officer of the Senate with authority to compel the production of books and papers, summon witnesses, and take testimony in order to ascertain:
> 1. Whether any individual, firm, or corporation in the United States has made loans or advances to any individual, firm, or corporation owning ships which are detained in the ports of the United States or elsewhere to avoid the consequences of war.

2. Whether any individual, firm, or corporation in the United States has at any time obtained options upon any such ship or ships.
3. Whether the persons, firms, or corporations having made such loans or obtained such options have any connection, direct or indirect, with the Government of the United States.

Mr. President, the broad implication that is running through those two resolutions is that the Senator who is their author has the right to believe that there are persons, firms, or corporations who are preparing to traffic in the vessels it is proposed to purchase who have a direct connection with the Government of the United States. The office of the Secretary of the Treasury is dragged in by these resolutions, and the implication is broad that he is in possession of such knowledge and that he is party or privy to such an infamous undertaking. That, I say, is a very grave charge to bring, and it is none the less brought because it is made by innuendo instead of by direction.

This body ought to be something besides a mere vent for scandal or the exploitation of libel. No resolution ought to be introduced in this body to give tongue to foul and evil reports that have been expressed only by the lips of the irresponsible. No food ought to be furnished here upon which newspapers that are antagonistic to an administration can base alleged news articles, stating that the Secretary of the Treasury is about to be investigated, that certain banking houses are about to be investigated, and that his connection therewith is about to be investigated, unless the Senator who offers the resolution is prepared to say upon the floor of the Senate that he has information warranting that kind of an implication.

I desire to ask the Senator from Ohio now whether he has any information from any reliable source, from any trustworthy source, that the Secretary of the Treasury has been engaged in any improper practice with reference to any of the matters referred to in these resolutions?

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I would not wish to vouch for statements to that effect. I am very glad to see that the Senator from Missouri is now a champion against irresponsible utterances. I think that is quite in contrast with his attitude on this floor at other times.

Mr. REED. In what respect, if the Senator please? I should like to have him present the facts instead of a mere fulmination.

Mr. BURTON. I make that statement to the Senate. The Members of the Senate will understand.

We had here at the last session, was it not, an intimation that there was an insidious lobby about the Senate. Were there any facts transmitted by those who made that assertion?

Mr. REED. Oh, yes; there were plenty of facts, and we made the charges good.

Mr. BURTON. If that is the case——

Mr. REED. There was a mass of evidence that is absolutely overwhelming. It was sufficient at the time to silence the tongue of criticism. Even the Senator from Ohio sat as mum as an oyster.

Mr. BURTON. If that is the case—if the committee made good—how came it that after not only weeks but months that committee which has found such disclosures should never have taken the Senate into its confidence——

Mr. REED. Oh, Mr. President——

Mr. BURTON. And should never have taken time to formulate a report?

What I say in regard to this, I repeat. There is no innuendo here against the Secretary of the Treasury, but it does seem to me that the circumstances under which this bill is reported are very mysterious. It was first——

Mr. REED. What bill?

Mr. BURTON. First, it was brought before us as a measure to promote trade with South America. When the props were taken out from under that argument the pressure for the bill continues, in the face of condemnatory facts, with a persistence I have never seen equaled in any measure before the House of Representatives or the Senate. In view of the unprecedented obstinacy in pushing this measure and the statements made here upon the floor of the Senate, not specially aimed against the Secretary of the Treasury—perhaps not aimed against him at all, most of them—I think it well that the Senate should investigate it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am glad to know that the Senator now states on the floor of the Senate, and in that way to the country, that he has not intended to cast any imputation upon the integrity of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. BURTON. No; by no means.

Mr. REED. And he also states that he will not vouch for any information that he has received. In this connection I desire to suggest that in the future he had better call some one in who can prepare a resolution of inquiry in such a way that it will not be taken by the press of the country as a charge against an honorable gentleman.

I also call attention to the fact that the Senator from Ohio this morning took pains to read a section of the statute which contains the provision that Congress may compel the Secretary of the Treasury to appear before it and answer questions. The only possible purpose of reading the statute was to aid the innuendo that the Secretary is in possession of information that he is unwilling to disclose and to make it appear that he can be compelled to make disclosure, even against his will.

I can say to the Senator from Ohio, and I say it with authority, that the Secretary of the Treasury welcomes this investigation and will gladly embrace the opportunity to meet face to face every scandalmonger, whether he be official or nonofficial, whether he be an employee of the Shipping Trust or whether he be a certain private speculator and promoter who is disappointed because he could not carry through a scheme to organize a corporation to buy interned ships and have the United States underwrite its bonds, and who is especially irritated at the Secretary of the Treasury because he refused to become a party to his promotion scheme.

Mr. President, the particular matter before the Senate is the amendment to this second resolution offered by the Senator from Ohio, which proposes to enlarge that resolution, so that we may ascertain whether our old friend, the Shipping Trust, has been unduly active. We already know that its attorneys have prepared briefs and circulated them among the Members of the Senate opposing this bill. We already know that certain exchanges which have a long time been unduly influenced, if not entirely commanded, by the shipping interests have become very active. We already know that there are plenty of Senators who have bottomed their arguments against this bill upon the hypothesis that it is a very wicked thing for the Government of the United States to compete with private business. We also know that that is the argument nearest to the heart of the shipping combine. It is an argument that they are forever putting out. So I am in favor of enlarging the inquiry.

The Senator from Ohio referred to the lobby committee and to the fact that it has not made a report. Let me say to him that a very full report of the salient points of the evidence taken was printed in the daily newspapers for weeks and months, so that everybody in the United States except the Senator from Ohio knew there had been a lobby here; that it has been a corrupt lobby; that it resorted to infamous methods to accomplish detestable ends; and that it ought to be stamped out of existence.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, will the Senator——

Mr. REED. Everybody but the Senator from Ohio knew that fact. Whether he now knows it I can not say, except that he just now complained that he had not been taken into the confidence of the committee. I therefore infer he has forgotten what the papers published.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. BURTON. I desire most decidedly to deny any knowledge of the existence of any corrupt lobby here. I feel very sure that nothing of the kind is true. I trust that the Senator from Missouri having started out on an apparently high plane, demanding care in making accusations and demanding that all idle utterances be checked, will not indulge in anything of that kind himself.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, what I have just said may seem an idle utterance to the Senator from Ohio, but I repeat he is the only man in the United States who does not know the facts I have already asserted and does not know that they were fully proven. I attribute his lack of knowledge to the fact that he has as usual been dwelling in that intellectual dreamland in which he has habitually lived for many years. There are a great many intelligent men, very high-class men, who would not know if their own pockets were picked twenty times a day. I commend to the Senator, who does not know there has been a lobby in Washington, and that the fact was proven, the wisdom of coming down to earth. I recommend to him consideration of the old anecdote of Diogenes, who, in his day and generation, said to a dreamer who was constantly looking at the stars and who naturally fell into a mudhole in the street, "that he had better keep his head out of the stars while his feet were upon the earth."

Mr. President, I utter no idle words, I engage in no slander, I offend against no propriety when I say that volume after volume of testimony taken by the lobby committee did show an intolerable condition of affairs to have existed in Washington.

Let me call the attention of the distinguished Senator to one fact. It showed that there was an organization known as the American Wool Manufacturers' Association; that it united itself with a wool growers' association; that they had many meetings for the purpose of promoting legislation for their especial benefit. Finally, when a tariff bill was before Congress, these patriotic gentlemen sent one of their employees, their hired man, their secretary, to Washington. He was taken not only into the confidence of the Republican members of the Finance Committee of the Senate, but into the pay of the Government. He sat with the Republican members of the Finance Committee when they were engaged in private deliberations behind locked doors. The public was excluded and the Democratic members were excluded. There this man assisted them in preparing schedule K of the tariff bill. Every day he reported to his boss, the president of this woolen manufacturers' association, what had been done; and every day received his commands from the proprietor of that association. Every day he labored to write into the bill the propositions that had been put forward by the woolen and wool associations. Every night he reported progress. At the end of the deliberations of that caucus of the Republican members of that committee, held behind closed doors, this gentleman, Mr. North, transmitted to his employer, the Woolen Trust, the happy information that they had succeeded in writing into the bill every single desire they had. Then, this gentleman, Mr. North, went home, had his salary raised, and was presented with $5,000 as a bonus for his services in acting at one and the same time as the representative of the Woolen Trust and as an employee of the Federal Government.

That may not shock the conscience of the Senator from Ohio; that may not be any evidence whatever to him that anything wrong or wicked was going on; that performance may have been highly ethical; perhaps it should be regarded as the highest order of statesmanship; but if things like that can be done in this country, and if those who have been guilty of them can go unwhipped, at least by the lash of public disapproval, then the day has come when interests—selfish interests—can enter the halls of legislation, appear before committees, and control the course of legislation; selfish interests can write the laws of the country, instead of the people of the country writing them through their representatives—if that sort of thing does not shock the conscience of the Senator from Ohio, if it does not appall his sensitive soul, if it does not appeal to him as a thing utterly infamous, then let me say to him that the plain, common people who walk this earth and who do not dream beautiful dreams and keep their heads among the stars—those people, at least, regard it as infamous conduct; and if it should be persisted in, a condition utterly unspeakable and utterly intolerable would obtain.

We also had some evidence before that committee not only tending to show but absolutely demonstrating certain other facts. It was proven there that there was an organization, the National Association of Manufacturers, having an enormous membership, composed of the great manufacturing and the jobbing wholesale interests of the country, with some others added; that they constantly maintained an organization in the city of Washington. The lobbyists of this concern took means to keep track of every bill and the vote of every Member of Congress upon such bill. When a Member of Congress could not be seduced by flattery or cajoled by persuasion into acting with them they sent their hired emissaries into his district with money in their purses. They even corrupted members of labor organizations who were professing to be sincerely with the laboring men, but at the same time were in the employment of this concern. Thus, by the use of money and influence, they sought to destroy every man who dared offend against their particular wishes. They inaugurated a propaganda against those who opposed them; they maintained it for many years. They spent tens of thousands of dollars in pursuit of methods which may be justly characterized as un-American, outrageous, intolerable, and infamous.

It was produced in evidence that these gentlemen went into the State of Indiana; that they raised money there for the purpose of using it in the campaign of one of their friends. They sent their representative and agent there; they had conferences with a man then a Representative in Congress, who was also at that time a candidate for governor of that State. They continued to sit with him in his conferences and continued to furnish sinews of war for his contest. When he was defeated for governor, and when his office as Representative expired, that Representative left the Halls of Congress, and within less than 10 days' time, if my recollection serves me aright, he became the paid employee of this same beneficent and patriotic institution! Yet the Senator from Ohio doubtless can see no wrong in that. I have no doubt he belongs to that class of men who are able to imagine that the Indiana gentleman was employed merely as a lawyer; that this institution did not intend by paying him a fee to compensate him for the misfortunes of his campaign, and that it had in mind nothing in the world in the way of the purchase of political or legislative influence, and that it employed him only because there was no other lawyer capable of giving sound legal advice.

Because I say that there were improper influences here the Senator from Ohio calls that wild talk and talk that is not backed by anything. The difference between the Senator and myself is that he introduces a resolution here reflecting on an honorable gentleman and says that he does it upon a rumor that he does not vouch for, whereas I say that there was a corrupt lobby here; that we proved it and that the evidence is here now before the Senate, as it has been for many weeks. It is a singular thing to me that the Senator from Ohio, with his well-known industry and habits of study, has been prevented from reading the evidence himself, in order that he might make up an opinion that would be very much superior to any report that any committee could possibly write.

Mr. President, I welcome this investigation. I am glad it is here. I hope that every man who has been engaged in the business of peddling scandal will be given an opportunity to come before a committee and tell us the reason he has had for any statements he may have made. I hope that every man who is interested in acting with the Shipping Trust in opposition to this bill will have an opportunity to understand that there is a place where he can make known every evil and wicked thing which either exists in fact or has been disturbing his imagination; and I venture the prediction that the investigation will do much good.

So, Mr. President, I am for this resolution, and I am for the other resolution offered by the Senator from Ohio when he cuts out of it the language that is offensive and that should not be in it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, before this matter is disposed of I desire to say a word.

The distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] referred, in terms that might be described as mildly contemptuous, to the work of the lobby investigating committee; and in recent months similar observations have been made by other Senators upon the other side of the Chamber. Mr. President, I desire to remind the Senator from Ohio and the Senate, in view of an apparent criticism because the report from that committee has not been received, that the committee was appointed pursuant to a resolution introduced by the Senator from the State of Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], who became a member of that committee and rendered signal service in connection with its work. The committee performed a large amount of service, which, in my very humble judgment, was a very valuable service.

Mr. President, while we were exposing to the country and to the Senate the fact that representatives of the great sugar industry of this country were gathered here, were accumulating a great fund, and employing daily a large amount of money for the purpose of affecting legislation then pending in their interest, there was not any suggestion contemptuous in character that that investigation ought to cease. When we were exposing the remarkable revelations in connection with the inquiry, started by papers that were obtained from a man by the name of Mulhall, there was not any suggestion that that inquiry was not valuable and should not progress; and let me remark here, Mr. President, that however one may hold that gentleman in the utmost detestation—and none can express sentiments or harbor sentiments of that character more profound than those I entertain—it is to be borne in mind that the people who hired him and in whose employ he was here, knew the despicable character of the man all the time he was in their employ for the purpose of influencing legislation in the Congress of the United States.

There was not any contemptuous comment concerning those matters while they were going on; and now, Mr. President, let me remark that some time ago the chairman of the lobby committee parceled out to the various members of the committee the duty of preparing a report upon various departments of the work undertaken by the committee, a portion of that work being assigned to the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], who has not been any more speedy about getting his report done than the rest of us.

It is to be borne in mind, Mr. President, that we have been worked hard. I do not think that the lobby committee ought to be charged upon the floor of the Senate with any dereliction of duty because they have not made a report. Of what consequence is their report? The testimony is here; it is printed. It has been read either in full or in substance by every Member of this body. Whatever good can come from the work of that committee—and I undertake to say that no man upon this floor will assert that it has not been large and valuable—has already been done without regard to the report.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. WALSH. I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. BURTON. Were any specific facts or accusations submitted to the so-called committee on the lobby when they commenced their investigation?

Mr. WALSH. Why, Mr. President, the committee immediately proceeded to inquire from all sources concerning which they had knowledge. Let me remark that just exactly what information the Senator from Iowa who introduced the resolution had which prompted him to present the resolution and urge the adoption of it by this body I am unable to say. The Senator from Ohio will get definite information on that subject by propounding his inquiry to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. BURTON. But is it not a fact, then, that, based upon rumors which were in general circulation, the committee on the lobby, without any definite statement of facts or accusations against anyone, commenced the investigation?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I am not to be diverted to the consideration of that question. I have offered no criticism of the Senator from Ohio because of the introduction of this resolution by him upon such information as he may possess. What I do object to is the suggestion that a committee of this body that labored earnestly and hard, that devoted hour after hour, day after day, and month after month, often sitting until past midnight at night, was engaged in a work which now deserves to be treated and disposed of and discussed in this body as quite contemptuous in character.

Mr. BURTON. Well, Mr. President, the inquiry that I am making is this: Did not that committee—which I have no doubt performed very valuable public service, exposed corruption, and brought to light facts which should be known to the country—begin its work without any accusation vouched for by anybody?

Mr. WALSH. That is not correct at all. It did not begin its work without accusation vouched for on the very best authority; and the information that was given to us we prosecuted and we unearthed the facts; we unearthed documents which demonstrated that corrupting influences were at work.

Mr. BURTON. What specific facts were here before the Senate at the time the resolution was presented for adoption?

Mr. WALSH. I say to the Senator from Ohio that I do not know. He must address that inquiry to the originator of the resolution. The Senator from Missouri now asks the Senator from Ohio what information he has on which he has introduced this resolution for an inquiry. I say to him that he must propound his inquiry now to the Senator from Iowa, who introduced the resolution, and ask him what information he had.

Mr. BURTON. But, Mr. President, the point I intend to make is that the so-called lobby investigation, which, it is maintained, led to such important disclosures, was instituted under circumstances precisely similar to those under which this resolution is proposed, based upon charges that were made in a vague, general way.

I do not wish, Mr. President, to have this question or the other go past the hour of 2 o'clock, I am frank to say, otherwise I might have some further remarks to make.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendments reported by the committee.

The amendments were agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair appoints the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] the special committee.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. WALSH:

A bill (S. 7653) to authorize the sale of certain lands at or near Belton, Mont., for hotel purposes (with accompanying map); to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. JONES:

A bill (S. 7654) granting an increase of pension to Mary S. Underhill (with accompanying paper); and

A bill (S. 7655) granting an increase of pension to John Little (with accompanying paper); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BURLEIGH:

A bill (S. 7656) granting an increase of pension to Leroy Harding; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. O'GORMAN:

A bill (S. 7657) granting an increase of pension to Roderick O'Connor; to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. SMOOT submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate the sum of $100,000 for a proportionate share of the amount required to construct an interstate wagon road or highway from the Kaibab Indian Reservation, Utah, intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill (H. R. 20150), which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SMOOT submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $110,998.12 for the relief of Prof. William H. H. Hart, principal of the Hart Farm School and Junior Republic for Dependent Children, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill (H. R. 21318), which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WORKS submitted an amendment proposing for terminal inspection of postal packages containing plant products, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the agricultural appropriation bill (H. R. 20415), which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry and ordered to be printed.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. ROOT submitted an amendment, intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill (H. R. 20189), which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. TILLMAN submitted an amendment providing that hereafter vacancies in the grade of second lieutenant of the Corps of Engineers, United States Army, shall be filled by promotion from the Corps of Cadets at the United States Academy, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill (H. R. 20189), which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

PALOUSE IRRIGATION PROJECT.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have here a report, prepared after a very careful and special investigation, on the Palouse irrigation project in our State. In view of the fact that Congress now has to make appropriations for irrigation purposes, I want to submit a request that it be printed as a public document, and ask that it be referred to the Committee on Printing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

PROMOTION OF AMERICAN COMMERCE.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 545), which was read:

Whereas the Secretary of the Department of Commerce, Hon. William C. Redfield, delivered an address before the United States Chamber of Commerce at its session held in the city of Washington, February 4, 1915, in which the following statement was made:

"I have had a dispatch from the prime minister of a great country abroad, so frank as hardly to be publishable in its original form, almost begging—let us say strongly urging—that America take the place in his country that Europe has laid aside. I have another from a monarch himself of a European power saying frankly that he wanted America to come into his land and take the place which others had hitherto filled.

"To-day an able attaché is there at the court of that monarch speaking the monarch's language, thank God, and entering his country to do what he can do to unite that nation to ours. The King has said that he will put into America a branch of the bank of his country if we will undertake to establish banks in his country, and that whatever he can do officially to forward American commerce in his land shall be willingly and continuously done"; and

Whereas under the present delicate and critical state of international relations arising from the assertion of neutral and belligerent rights and obligations during the present war it is desirable that Congress shall know how many and what different departments of our Government are engaged in carrying on negotiations with foreign powers and whether such negotiations are of a character to disturb the balance of conditions created by war between other powers and to involve the United States in violation of neutrality: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of Commerce be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the Senate copies of the communications referred to in the remarks above quoted and of the instructions to and the reports from the attaché therein mentioned.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Michigan if he knows of his own knowledge whether that is the exact language used by the Secretary of Commerce in that address, or did he get it from some other source?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I sent to the office of the United States Chamber of Commerce and received the corrected proof of the Secretary's speech. I went through it carefully and compared it with this language, which has been publicly printed, and I find that it is the same language. I think it is most inappropriate language, especially in view of the fact that the statutes of our country forbid correspondence of this kind by citizens. I therefore feel that we ought to ask the Secretary of the Department of Commerce whether or not this was his statement, and what he has to say about it.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The resolution will go over, I presume.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will not enter into any discussion of the matter, because we have not time to dwell upon it at all. I only suggest that it seems to me the language of the resolution is scarcely courteous or considerate, in that it directs the Secretary of Commerce to give certain information. There is no head of a department who can be directed by the Senate to do things. The direction must come from a joint resolution approved by the President.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Oh, I think the Senator is mistaken about that. I think we ought to direct him.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am not going to discuss it. I ask that the resolution may lie over.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Under the rule it must go over, though I am sorry the Senator makes that request.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 21318. An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1916, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ADDITIONAL JUDGE, SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF GEORGIA.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to a bill, being House bill 17869, Order of Business 796, for the appointment of an additional district judge for the southern district of Georgia. It is only 9 lines long, and originated in the Judiciary Committee of the House. It has the unanimous indorsement of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate. It is a local bill, and an emergency measure. It gives the southern district of Georgia an additional judge, and it is very necessary that they should have it. I certainly would appreciate it if the Senate would grant unanimous consent for the consideration of this bill, and I ask such consent.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I have a resolution here which has been pending since Saturday. As I understand, this bill has been amended by direction of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It has.

Mr. BURTON. I may say that by a coincidence I have received a protest against that bill, but I think, in the form it is amended, it is without objection. I should, however, feel like insisting that the Senate adhere to it in the form as amended.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I shall ask for its passage just as it is amended.

Mr. BURTON. And the Senator from Georgia intends to adhere to that?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I will get it that way, if possible, if it goes to conference. Personally, I very much prefer it to be just as the Senate has amended it.

Mr. BURTON. And the Senator from Georgia will advocate that in conference?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I certainly shall; yes. I very much prefer it as the Senate has amended it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have likewise received one or two letters about this bill. I will ask the Senator from Georgia if in conference the conferees of the other body should resist this amendment, whether he would be willing to bring it back to the Senate for a vote of the Senate on the amendment?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I should be obliged to do it. I would hate to jeopardize the bill. I will say to the Senator that I very much prefer the bill just as the Senate Judiciary Committee has amended it. Personally, I would take nearly any kind of bill to get the additional judge, but I greatly prefer it just as it is, and I certainly would do everything I could in conference to get it just as it is.

Mr. GALLINGER. It has been suggested to me, very likely without authority, that if the bill passes in its present form it will come back to the Senate shorn of the amendment.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I hope not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on the Judiciary was, on page 1, line 9, after the word "therein," to strike out "Provided, however, That the President shall make public all indorsements made in behalf of the person appointed as such district judge."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, to strike out all of section 2, as follows:

SEC. 2. That whenever a vacancy shall occur in the office of the district judge for the southern district of the State of Georgia senior in commission such vacancy shall not be filled, and thereafter there shall be but one district judge in said district.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, after line 5, to strike out section 3, as follows:

SEC. 3. That the senior circuit judge of the circuit in which the southern district of Georgia lies shall make all necessary orders for the division of business and the assignment of cases for trial in said district between the several district judges therein.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Has the bill been read?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has not.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I should like to hear what the bill contains.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

The Secretary read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States shall appoint an additional district judge for the southern district of the State of Georgia, by and with the consent of the Senate, who shall reside in the said district and shall possess the same qualifications and have the same power and jurisdiction and receive the same salary now prescribed by law in respect of the present district judge therein.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

AMENDMENT OF THE RULES.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Is Senate resolution 542 now before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the Chair is about to hand down another matter coming over from a previous day. We are not running on schedule time.

The Secretary read the following resolution (S. Res. 546), given by Mr. GORE on the 11th instant:

Amend Rule V by adding the following language:

"Whenever a quorum fails to vote on any question, and a quorum is not present and objection is made for that cause, unless the Senate shall adjourn, there shall be a call of the Senate, and the Sergeant at Arms shall forthwith proceed to bring in absent Members, and the yeas and nays on the pending question shall at the same time be considered as ordered. The Secretary shall call the roll, and each Member as he answers to his name may vote on the pending question; and after the roll call is completed each Member arrested shall be brought by the Sergeant at Arms before the Senate, whereupon he shall be noted as present, discharged from arrest, and given an opportunity to vote, and his vote shall be recorded. If those voting on the question and those who are present and decline to vote shall, together, make a majority of the Senate, the Presiding Officer shall declare that a quorum is constituted and the pending question shall be decided as the majority of those voting shall appear. And thereupon further proceedings under the call shall be considered as dispensed with. At any time after the roll call has been completed the Presiding Officer may entertain a motion to adjourn, if seconded by a majority of those present, to be ascertained by actual count by the Presiding Officer; and if the Senate adjourns, all proceedings under this section shall be vacated."

Mr. REED and Mr. SMOOT addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Oklahoma does not appear to be in the Chamber. This is a notice given by him, and it ought not to be disposed of in his absence.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest to the Senator from Missouri that it ought to go to the Committee on Rules, ought it not?

Mr. REED. Let it go to the Committee on Rules, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the notice will be referred to the Committee on Rules.

The Chair lays before the Senate a motion coming over from a previous day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the following motion, submitted by Mr. OWEN on the 11th instant:

UNITED STATES SENATE,
Washington, D. C., February 11, 1915.

Mr. PRESIDENT: I very respectfully move that the honorable Committee on Rules be discharged from further consideration of S. Res. 283, proposing an amendment to Rule XIX of the Standing Rules of the Senate and proposing cloture.

ROBERT L. OWEN.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not see the Senator from Oklahoma in the Chamber, but I suppose that motion should also go to the Committee on Rules. I suggest, therefore, that it be referred to that committee.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think it ought to lie over.
Mr. STONE. Why should it not lie over?
Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly willing that it shall lie over.
The VICE PRESIDENT. Shall it go over without prejudice?
Mr. REED. Mr. President——
Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——
The VICE PRESIDENT. Does any Senator desire to object to this motion going over without prejudice?
Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wanted to suggest that I think the RECORD will show that the Committee on Rules reported on Saturday the very resolution that this motion seeks to bring before the Senate.
Mr. LEA of Tennessee. That was another resolution, I will say to the Senator from Nebraska.
Mr. NORRIS. Very well.
The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over without prejudice.

SHIPS OF BELLIGERENT NATIONS.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask to have laid before the Senate resolution 542.
Mr. REED. Mr. President——
The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri.
Mr. REED. Did the Senator from Florida wish to——
Mr. FLETCHER. I wish to have the resolution laid before the Senate.
Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, we can not hear what is the request.
The VICE PRESIDENT. No; nor can the Chair.
Mr. REED. I wanted to know what the request of the Senator from Florida was, and I understand that he wants resolution 542 laid before the Senate. I am willing to yield for that purpose.
The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?
Mr. ROOT. What is the resolution?
The VICE PRESIDENT. It is a resolution coming over from a preceding day. Is there objection to it?
Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, it is evident that if there is to be any discussion upon this resolution the hour of 2 o'clock will be reached before it can be disposed of; so, unless Senators on the other side are ready to vote immediately on it, I ask that it may go over without prejudice.
Mr. FLETCHER. I would like to have it disposed of. I have no objection to it being agreed to. I desire to put into the RECORD a letter which I have just received from the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject, and for that reason I want to present it now. I have no objection to the resolution being agreed to, if it is desired to take that course.
Mr. BURTON. Certainly. I desire to have it agreed to as soon as possible.
Mr. FLETCHER. I desire to say that it is unnecessary to pass the resolution. The letter speaks for itself. I will read it:

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, February 15, 1915.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR FLETCHER: Please let me thank you for your courtesy in calling to my attention Senate resolution No. 542, introduced by Senator BURTON on Saturday last, the 13th instant, calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury for certain information. An implication seems to underlie the resolution, which, I take it for granted, is not intended.

Inasmuch as I am more than glad to furnish the Senate all the information at my command in response to the inquiries suggested by the resolution, and as the information is now in preparation and will be sent to you as soon as completed, the passage of the resolution is unnecessary.

Faithfully, yours,

W. G. MCADOO.

With that statement from the Secretary of the Treasury, if the Senator desires to press the resolution, I have no objection to its adoption.
Mr. BURTON. I think it should pass. The Secretary of the Treasury is no doubt preparing now——
Mr. REED. Mr. President, with all due respect to my friend the Senator from Florida, I do not think this resolution ought to be adopted in its present form.
The VICE PRESIDENT. In order that we may proceed regularly the Chair takes this resolution out of its regular place and lays it before the Senate.
The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 542, by Mr. BURTON.
Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be read.
The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.
Mr. BURTON. It has already been read, has it not?
The VICE PRESIDENT. Unfortunately, the Chair thinks that when a Senator asks for the reading of a resolution he is entitled to have it read.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 542, submitted by Mr. BURTON on the 13th instant, as follows:

Whereas the pending ship-purchase bill, being S. 6856, contemplates by certain of its provisions the purchase of shipping tonnage already constructed and therefore suggests the possible acquisition of ships belonging to belligerents, some of which are interned in American and other ports as the result of the war; and

Whereas the purchase of such vessels would raise questions of vital importance to the interests of the United States, a knowledge of which is of supreme importance in order that the Senate may reach an intelligent conclusion as to the advisability of enacting said bill and as to the propriety of incorporating in its provisions certain amendments: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested, and is hereby directed, to transmit, at his earliest convenience, to the Senate of the United States information responsive to the following queries:

First. Has the Secretary of the Treasury knowledge that any officer of the Government has made overtures or addressed inquiries to the owners of ships under the flags of belligerent nations, including those ships now detained in ports of the United States or other neutral ports, with a view to the purchase of such ships on the part of the Government of the United States or any of its authorized agencies?

Second. Have tenders of sale of any merchant ship or ships carrying the flag of any of the belligerent nations been made to the United States or any of its officers or agencies?

Third. Have there been any tenders for the sale of vessels at present carrying the flag of any neutral nation to the United States or any responsible officer or agent thereof?

Fourth. Is it within the knowledge of the Secretary of the Treasury that any individual, firm, or corporation in the United States has made loans or advances to any individual, firm, or corporation owning ships which are detained in the ports of the United States or elsewhere to avoid the consequences of war; or that any person, firm, or corporation, acting either in private capacity or that of agent for the Government, holds an option on any such ship or ships, contemplating their transfer either to the Government of the United States, an agency thereof, or to private citizens of the United States?

Fifth. Is it within the knowledge of the Secretary of the Treasury that the Government of the United States or any official thereof has in his employ or under his direction any person or agent who is making inquiry as to the possibility of purchasing any ship or ships of any description whatsoever contemplating their eventual transfer to the United States or an agency thereof?

In each of the above instances the names of the persons, ships, and terms involved in each contemplated sale or purchase is requested.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, the resolution itself I have no objection to, but the preamble to the resolution is of such a character that the Senate ought not to be committed to it. The preamble, I think, is highly objectionable. It is no part of the resolution. I ask the Senator from Ohio if, in order to get his resolution through this morning, he is not willing to strike out the two whereases and let the resolution stand by itself?

LIMITATION OF DEBATE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning hour having expired, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, the motion by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to amend Rule XXII of the standing rules of the Senate.
Mr. BURTON. I ask unanimous consent——
Mr. REED. I move that the motion made by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], to refer the pending resolution to a committee, together with all amendments to the resolution or to the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire, be laid upon the table.
Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.
Mr. WILLIAMS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.
The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Connecticut.
Mr. BRANDEGEE. Is Senate resolution 542 before the Senate at the present time?
The VICE PRESIDENT. No; the unfinished business is the motion by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to amend Rule XXII of the standing rules of the Senate. That is the unfinished business, and it is before the Senate. The motion of the Senator from Missouri is addressed to that, the Chair understands.
Mr. BRANDGEE. That is what the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire refers to?
The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks the Chair is in possession of the proposition to which the Senator from Missouri addressed his motion, namely, that the proposed amendment to Rule XXII, it was moved by the Senator from New Hampshire, be sent to the Committee on Rules, and a motion to lay that motion on the table——
Mr. GALLINGER. Did not prevail.
The VICE PRESIDENT. Did not prevail. Then the Senator from Missouri amended his resolution attaching instructions to the resolution he moved to amend, and the motion to lay that on the table failed. Then the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] introduced an amendment. Now, as the Chair understands, the Senator from Missouri moves to lay the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire with all subsequent amendments on the table.
Mr. REED. I ask for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I do not recall that I have made a motion to lay the resolution on the table as amended by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. BURTON. It has not been amended.

Mr. GALLINGER. It has not been amended as yet, I understand.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I call for the regular order.

Mr. GALLINGER. This is the regular order.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Goff	Martine, N. J.	Shively
Brandegee	Gronna	Myers	Simmons
Bristow	Hardwick	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.
Bryan	Hitchcock	Newlands	Smith, Ga.
Burton	Hollis	Norris	Smith, Md.
Camden	Hughes	O'Gorman	Smoot
Catron	James	Overman	Stephenson
Chilton	Johnson	Owen	Sterling
Clapp	Jones	Page	Stone
Clark, Wyo.	Kenyon	Perkins	Sutherland
Clarke, Ark.	Kern	Pittman	Swanson
Colt	La Follette	Pomerene	Thomas
Crawford	Lane	Ransdell	Thompson
Culberson	Lea, Tenn.	Reed	Tillman
Cummins	Lee, Md.	Robinson	Vardaman
Dillingham	Lewis	Root	Walsh
du Pont	Lippitt	Saulsbury	Warren
Fall	Lodge	Shafroth	Weeks
Fletcher	McLean	Sheppard	White
Gallinger	Martin, Va.	Shields	Williams

Mr. RANSDELL. The senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON] is absent on account of illness. He is paired with the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES]. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] on account of illness.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I rise to a question of order. A motion was made to lay the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire to refer on the table and that motion was defeated. The rule is a very familiar one about the renewal of motions to lay on the table. I quote it because it is well stated in Reed's Parliamentary Rules:

> If the motion to lay on the table be decided in the negative, the original question proceeds as if the motion had not been made, and the motion may be renewed when there has been such progress as to make the motion substantially a new one.

There has been no progress made whatever. Moving amendments does not constitute progress. The original motion has been in nowise changed. If an amendment had been adopted, then a motion to lay on the table would undoubtedly be in order, but there has been no change in the motion. It is a repetition to lay on the table the original motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair supposes that this is a question that might as well be settled now as at any other time, and the Senate must settle it finally. The Chair thinks that sufficient time has elapsed and sufficient progress has been made in the consideration of this question to entitle the Senator from Missouri to again move to lay on the table the original motion and the amendments thereto.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, from that ruling I respectfully appeal.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts appeals from the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Tennessee moves that the appeal be laid on the table.

Mr. SMOOT. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I desire to announce that for the day I am paired with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON], and therefore I withhold my vote.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas (when the name of Mr. SMITH of South Carolina was called). The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is absent on account of illness in his family. He is paired with the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW], which pair will expire this evening.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. OLIVER. I am paired with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], and therefore withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. BRISTOW (after having voted in the negative). I desire to state that for the day I am paired with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. As he is not present, I withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 44, nays 46, as follows:

YEAS—44.

Ashurst	La Follette	Pittman	Smith, Ariz.
Bryan	Lane	Pomerene	Smith, Ga.
Chilton	Lea, Tenn.	Ransdell	Smith, Md.
Culberson	Lee, Md.	Reed	Stone

NOT VOTING—6.

Bristow	Jones	Smith, S. C.	Thornton
Chamberlain	Oliver

So the Senate refused to lay Mr. LODGE's appeal on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is now, Shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the decision of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I ventured very briefly to call attention to the parliamentary practice in regard to motions to lay on the table.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I ask for order.

Mr. REED. I make the point of order that the motion to lay on the table is not debatable.

Mr. LODGE. I am not debating a motion to lay on the table. I am debating the appeal.

Mr. REED. I make the point of order that the appeal is not debatable.

Mr. LODGE. We just voted down the motion to lay the appeal on the table, and that makes it debatable.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks it must be debatable when the motion to lay the appeal on the table was voted down.

Mr. LODGE. The question of order was whether the motion to lay on the table could be renewed, the vote having once been had on the motion to refer and it having been rejected. My point of order was that it could not be renewed until the subject had been changed and made substantially new matter. Nothing has changed the character of the motion to refer. There has been debate, there has been an amendment offered, but if you can change the character of what it is proposed to lay upon the table by the mere moving of amendments you can renew the motion to lay on the table every few minutes. If the moving of an amendment constitutes substantial progress and changes the character of the original subject you can repeat the motion to lay on the table indefinitely. If an amendment had been adopted, then it would have been in order, of course; but as for making a motion to carry these amendments with it, it does not alter it. If the motion to refer it laid on the table, of course, the amendment can not stand in the empty air attached to nothing.

But my point is that offering an amendment and debate do not change the character of the original subject. The Senate refused to lay on the table. Therefore I made the point of order that this renewal of a motion to lay on the table as applied to the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire to refer was not in order. It was moved to lay the appeal on the table. The Senate has refused to lay the appeal on the table. I do not care to discuss it further. I think the parliamentary point is distinctly clear.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the decision of the Senate?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BRISTOW (when his name was called). Making the announcement that I made formerly, that I am paired for the day with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], I withhold my vote. If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). I again announce my pair for the day with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. THORNTON]. I wish this announcement to stand for the remainder of the day. If permitted to vote on this question, I should vote "nay."

Mr. OLIVER (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]. I will allow the announcement to stand for the day. I withhold my vote.

The roll call having been concluded; the result was announced—yeas 45, nays 45, as follows:

YEAS—45.

Ashurst	La Follette	Pomerene	Smith, Md.
Bryan	Lane	Ransdell	Stone
Chilton	Lea, Tenn.	Reed	Swanson
Culberson	Lee, Md.	Robinson	Thomas

Hughes	Myers	Shields	White
James	Newlands	Shively	Williams
Johnson	Overman	Simmons
Kenyon	Owen	Smith, Ariz.
Kern	Pittman	Smith, Ga.

NAYS—45.

Bankhead	Crawford	McCumber	Smoot

Colt	Lodge	Smith, Mich.

NOT VOTING—6.

Bristow	Jones	Smith, S. C.	Thornton
Chamberlain	Oliver

The VICE PRESIDENT. The ruling of the Chair is sustained by a very slight majority. The question now recurs on the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to lay on the table.

Mr. REED. Have the yeas and nays been ordered on that motion, Mr. President?

The VICE PRESIDENT. They have not been ordered.

Mr. REED. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. LODGE. Do I understand the Chair to say that he voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Oh, no.

Mr. LODGE. Then the motion to sustain the Chair is lost.

The VICE PRESIDENT. No.

Mr. LODGE. On a tie vote the contention of the proponent is always lost, of course. It has not received a majority.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The appeal from the decision of the Chair must have a majority.

Mr. LODGE. That is not the question, if the Chair will pardon me. The question is, "Shall the ruling of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?"

The VICE PRESIDENT. Well, the Chair will vote "yea," then, and the judgment of the Chair is sustained. The question recurs——

Mr. NORRIS. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska will state it.

Mr. NORRIS. If this motion prevails, the proposition of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] then being before the Senate, will the amendment which I have offered as a substitute to his original proposition be in order? In other words, will the laying on the table of these three motions preclude me from again offering the amendment which I have offered and which is pending?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has not been so readily sustained by the Senate lately as to take any chances on making a ruling until the question arises. The Chair does not at the present time know whether the Senator's amendment would be or would not be in order.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not feel like taking any chances on it being in order for me to again offer my amendment.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, there is a good deal of uncertainty among Senators as to the precise question which is pending before the Senate, and I myself would be very glad, in answer to a parliamentary inquiry, if I might be informed as to the pending question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. As the Chair understands, the pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to lay on the table the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] to refer the proposition of the Senator from Missouri to the Committee on Rules, together with the motion of the Senator from Missouri to refer with instructions, together with the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I beg to say that it would seem perfectly clear that if the motion to lay on the table the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire to refer should be agreed to, the motion of the Senator from Nebraska, which is merely an amendment to the original motion made by the Senator from New Hampshire, would be in order as a separate and substantive proposition.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Missouri yield to me?

Mr. STONE. I meant to say it would be in order for the Senator from Nebraska to offer his proposition.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no doubt about that; I have never had any doubt about it in my own mind; but there have been some queer parliamentary decisions made here already to-day, and I do not want to take any chances on it.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Nebraska is right; there can be no doubt but that his amendment would be in order.

Mr. STONE. The Senator from Nebraska would not be taking any chances.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not think I would be taking any chances.

Mr. REED. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered and taken.

Mr. BRISTOW. I desire to make the same statement in regard to my pair on this vote as I have on previous votes to-day.

The result was announced—yeas 45, nays 45, as follows:

YEAS—45.

Ashurst	Lane	Pomerene	Smith, Md.
Bryan	Lea, Tenn.	Ransdell	Stone
Chilton	Lee, Md.	Reed	Swanson
Culberson	Lewis	Robinson	Thomas

NOT VOTING—6.

Bristow	Jones	Smith, S. C.	Thornton
Chamberlain	Oliver

The VICE PRESIDENT. On the motion of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to lay the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] and all amendments thereto on the table the yeas are 45 and the nays are 45. The Vice President votes "yea," and the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire and all amendments thereto are laid on the table.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. As a substitute for the pending resolution of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] I offer what I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the substitute proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

The Secretary read as follows:

Rule XLI. It shall be in order during the morning hour to make a motion that any bill or resolution then on the calendar shall be considered under the terms of this rule. Such motion when made shall lie over one day and shall then be decided without debate. When it has been decided to consider a bill or resolution under this rule the same shall first be considered in general debate, during which time no Senator, except by unanimous consent, shall be allowed to speak more than three hours. At the close of general debate the bill or resolution shall be read for amendments, and on any amendment that may be offered no Senator, except by unanimous consent, shall speak for more than 15 minutes: Provided, That any Senator who has not spoken for 3 hours in general debate shall, in addition to said 15 minutes, be allowed additional time, but in no case shall such additional time or times, including the time used by such Senator in general debate, exceed in the aggregate 3 hours. When the bill is being read for amendment all debate shall be confined to the amendment which is then pending.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to discuss briefly the amendment just offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] to the special order for the suspension of the rules proposed by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED]. In that connection I wish to call the attention of the Senate for a moment to the history of the rules.

Mr. President, almost the only information we have in regard to the proceedings of the Senate of the United States in the First Congress is contained in the Journal of William Maclay. Mr. Maclay was a Senator from Pennsylvania, and, as I have said, he wrote this journal during his service in the Senate, which was during the First Congress of the United States. Mr. Maclay was a man of strong prejudices and many dislikes, but he was diligent in his business in the Senate and followed everything very closely, making comments on his associates as he went along, such as the one that catches my eye at this moment by mere accident:

December 29.—This day a blank in the Senate with respect to any business of importance. Mr. Morris told me I was blamed for not going among the Members and speaking to them, etc. What a set of vipers I have to deal with.

That is a mere casual remark; but it is a very amusing diary, is quite instructive, and has a good deal of history in it. On the cover of his journal he wrote down the rules of procedure for the United States Senate in the First Congress. I have been much puzzled as to where those rules came from. They are obviously official, because the sixteenth rule requires that they "shall be engrossed on parchment and hung up in some conspicuous part of the Senate Chamber." They do not differ much in effect from the rules adopted by the Senate, but they are a different text. As a matter of curiosity merely——

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, some of us over here would like to know from what the Senator is reading?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). The Chair will admonish Senators to be in order.

Mr. OVERMAN. Am I not in order, Mr. President?

Mr. LODGE. The Senator is entirely in order, but he did not hear me. I mentioned the name repeatedly, but there was so much confusion that naturally he could not hear what I said.

Mr. OVERMAN. Several Senators on this side did not hear the name.

Mr. LODGE. This is the Journal of William Maclay, Senator from Pennsylvania in the First Congress of the United States, and it is an interesting book. The debates were not reported, the Journal is a dry and sterile record, and this diary is a valuable and amusing account of what the Senate did from April, 1789, to March 4, 1791. I ask that the rules as written on the cover of this diary may be printed at this point in my remarks. They are very brief.

SEVERAL SENATORS. Read them.

Mr. LODGE. Very well, I will ask to have them read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Was the Senator's request that the matter be read?

Mr. LODGE. Several Senators around me have asked that the rules be read, and if there is no objection I will ask the Secretary to read them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From the cover of William Maclay's Journal.]

THE RULES OF PROCEEDINGS FOR THE FIRST UNITED STATES SENATE.

Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its Members for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a Member (second clause, fifth section, first article on the Constitution of the United States).

Rule I. The President (of the Senate) should be in the chair within half an hour of the time to which the Senate stands adjourned, and the Senators shall immediately take their seats in a circular order, those from New Hampshire occupying the right of the Chair and those from Georgia the left.

Rule II. The minutes of the preceding day shall be read before any other business is entered upon; inaccuracies or inelegancies may be corrected or amended, but no reconsideration as to matter of substance shall take place on such reading.

Rule III. Every Senator presenting a petition, memorial, or other writing shall briefly state the import of the same, and every such paper after being read shall be deemed to lie on the table, unless the same is dismissed upon special motion for impropriety or want of decency.

Rule IV. Every motion made and seconded shall be repeated from the Chair and then be open to discussion. The motion, if verbal, shall be put in writing at the request of the President (of the Senate) or any two Senators.

Rule V. Adoption, rejection, amendment, commitment, or postponement shall be considered as proper modes of treating business; and in all cases (treaties, returned bills, etc., and the expulsion of a Member, excepted) a majority of votes shall govern.

Rule VI. Every Senator when speaking shall address himself to the Chair. No Senator shall be named in debate, but may be referred to by mentioning the State he represents or by alluding to his place in the House.

Rule VII. In case of a debate becoming tedious, four Senators may call for the question; or the same number may at any time move for the previous question, viz, "Shall the main question now be put?"

Rule VIII. Priority of speaking and all questions of order shall be decided by the President (of the Senate); but either party may appeal to a vote of the House.

Rule IX. The name of the Senator making and of the one who seconds a motion shall be entered on the Journal of the House.

Rule X. No Senator shall speak more than twice on the same subject without leave obtained from the Chair.

Rule XI. Inviolable secrecy shall be observed with respect to all matters transacted in the Senate while the doors are shut, or as often as the same is enjoined from the Chair.

Rule XII. Every member of a committee shall attend the same at the time appointed by the chairman, who shall be the Senator of the most northerly State of those from whom the committee are taken.

Rule XIII. When a commitment is agreed upon, the President (of the Senate) shall take the sense of the Senate as to the manner of appointing the committee, whether by motion from the Senators, nomination from the Chair, or by ballot, which shall take place accordingly.

Rule XIV. The files of the House shall remain open for the inspection of all the Senators, etc., but no original paper shall be removed from the House without leave obtained for that purpose by the Senate.

Rule XV. The yeas and nays on any question shall be entered on the Journals at the desire of one-fifth of the Senators present.

Rule XVI. These rules shall be engrossed on parchment and hung up in some conspicuous part of the Senate Chamber. And every Senator who shall neglect attendance during a session, absent himself without leave or withdraw for more than a quarter of an hour without permission after a quorum is formed, shall be guilty of disorderly behavior, and his name, together with the nature of the transgression, shall be written on a slip of paper and annexed to the bottom of the rules; there to remain until the Senate, on his application or otherwise, shall take order on the same.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, we can find in those rules, I think, the origin at least of some of the customs of the Senate. Wherever these rules came from, however they were superseded on April 16, 1789, by the adoption by the Senate of 19 rules. These, too, are very brief, and I shall not ask to have them read, but merely request that they be printed at this point in my remarks. I will read only one, as follows:

Rule VIII. While a question is before the Senate no motion shall be received unless for an amendment, for the previous question, or for postponing the main question, or to commit it, or to adjourn.

I ask that all these rules may now be printed as I have indicated. There is a whole set of them, but they are very brief.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Resolved, That the following rules, from No. I to XIX, inclusive, be observed:

I. The President having taken the chair, and a quorum being present, the Journal of the preceding day shall be read, to the end that any mistake may be corrected that shall have been made in the entries.

II. No Member shall speak to another, or otherwise interrupt the business of the Senate, or read any printed paper while the Journals or public papers are reading, or when any Member is speaking in debate.

III. Every Member, when he speaks, shall address the Chair, standing in his place, and when he has finished shall sit down.

IV. No Member shall speak more than twice in any one debate on the same day without leave of the Senate.

V. When two Members rise at the same time, the President shall name the person to speak; but in all cases the Member first rising shall speak first.

VI. No motion shall be debated until the same shall be seconded.

VII. When a motion shall be made and seconded it shall be reduced to writing, if desired by the President or any Member, delivered in at the table, and read by the President before the same shall be debated.

VIII. While a question is before the Senate no motion shall be received unless for an amendment for the previous question or for postponing the main question or to commit it or to adjourn.

IX. The previous question being moved and seconded, the question from the Chair shall be: "Shall the main question be now put?" And if the nays prevail, the main question shall not then be put.

X. If a question in debate contains several points, any Member may have the same divided.

XI. When the yeas and nays shall be called for by one-fifth of the Members present, each Member called upon shall, unless for special reasons he be excused by the Senate, declare openly and without debate his assent or dissent to the question. In taking the yeas and nays, and upon the call of the House, the names of the Members shall be taken alphabetically.

XII. One day's notice, at least, shall be given of an intended motion for leave to bring in a bill.

XIII. Every bill shall receive three readings previous to its being passed; and the President shall give notice at each, whether it be the first, second, or third, which readings shall be on three different days, unless the Senate unanimously direct otherwise.

XIV. No bill shall be committed or amended until it shall have been twice read, after which it may be referred to a committee.

XV. All committees shall be appointed by ballot, and a plurality of votes shall make a choice.

XVI. When a Member shall be called to order he shall sit down until the President shall have determined whether he is in order or not; and every question of order shall be decided by the President without debate; but if there be a doubt in his mind he may call for the sense of the Senate.

XVII. If a Member be called to order for words spoken, the exceptionable words shall be immediately taken down in writing that the President may be better enabled to judge of the matter.

XVIII. When a blank is to be filled and different sums shall be proposed the question shall be taken on the highest sum first.

XIX. No Member shall absent himself from the service of the Senate without leave of the Senate first obtained. (Journal of the Senate, 1789, pp. 14, 15.)

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, under those rules the Senate carried on its business until January, 1806. On Thursday, January 9, of that year:

On motion that it be—

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to take into consideration the twenty-third, twenty-seventh, thirty-fifth, and forty-first articles of the rules for conducting business in the Senate of the United States, and report to the Senate such alterations and amendments, if any, as they shall judge proper;

It was agreed that this motion lie for consideration.

* * * * * * *

Friday, January 10.

The Senate took into consideration the motion made yesterday for revising the rules for doing business in the Senate; and having amended the same,

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to take into consideration the rules for conducting the business of the Senate of the United States, and report to the Senate such alterations and amendments, if any, as they shall judge proper; and Ordered, That Messrs. Anderson, Tracy, Baldwin, Bradley, and Adams be the committee.

The Mr. Adams referred to was John Quincy Adams.

On March 13, page 183 of the Annals of Congress—

Mr. Anderson, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 10th of January last, the motion for a revision of the rules for conducting business in the Senate, made report; which was read, and ordered to lie for consideration.

On March 18—

The amendments reported by the committee to the rules for conducting business in the Senate were considered as in Committee of the Whole; and, having been further amended, were adopted and reported to the House.

Ordered, That they pass to a third reading.

On March 21—

The amendments reported to the rules for conducting business in the Senate were read the third time and further amendment proposed.

At that period amendments apparently were permitted after the third reading, which is not the case to-day. It was then—

Ordered, That the further consideration thereof be postponed.

On March 26—

The Senate resumed the amendments reported to the rules for conducting business of the Senate; and having agreed to further amendments, the rules were adopted as follows:

Mr. TOWNSEND. In what year was that?

Mr. LODGE. In 1806. These rules I shall also ask to have printed in my remarks, without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The rules referred to are as follows:

I. The President having taken the chair and a quorum being present, the Journal of the preceding day shall be read, to the end that any mistake may be corrected that shall have been made in the entries.

II. No Member shall speak to another or otherwise interrupt the business of the Senate, or read any newspaper, while the Journals or public papers are reading or when any Member is speaking in any debate.

III. Every Member when he speaks shall address the Chair, standing in his place, and when he has finished shall sit down.

IV. No Member shall speak more than twice in any one debate on the same day without leave of the Senate.

V. When two Members rise at the same time, the President shall name the person to speak, but in all cases the Member first rising shall speak first.

VI. No motion shall be debated until the same shall be seconded.

VII. When a motion shall be made and seconded it shall be reduced to writing, if desired by the President or any Member, delivered in at the table, and read by the President before the same shall be debated.

VIII. While a question is before the Senate no motion shall be received, unless for an amendment, for postponing the question or to commit it or to adjourn, and the motion for adjournment shall always be in order and decided without debate.

IX. If the question in debate contain several points, any Member may have the same divided.

X. When the yeas and nays shall be called for by one-fifth of the Members present each Member called upon shall, unless for special reason he be excused by the Senate, declare openly, and without debate, his assent or dissent to the question. In taking the yeas and nays and upon the call of the House the names of the Members shall be taken alphabetically.

XI. One day's notice at least shall be given of an intended motion for leave to bring in a bill.

XII. Every bill shall receive three readings previous to its being passed; and the President shall give notice to each, whether it be the first, second, or third, which readings shall be on three different days, unless the Senate unanimously direct otherwise. And all resolutions to which a concurrence of the House of Representatives is requisite or which may grant money out of the contingent or any other fund shall be treated, in all respects, in the introduction and form of proceedings on them in the Senate, in a similar manner with bills.

XIII. No bill shall be committed until it shall have been twice read, after which it may be referred to a committee.

XIV. All committees shall be appointed by ballot, and a plurality of votes shall make a choice. But when any subject or matter shall have been referred to a select committee any other subject or matter of a similar nature may, on motion, be referred to such committee.

XV. When a Member shall be called to order he shall sit down until the President shall have determined whether he is in order or not, and every question of order shall be decided by the President without debate; but if there be a doubt in his mind he may call for the sense of the Senate.

XVI. If a Member be called to order for words spoken, the exceptionable words shall immediately be taken down in writing, that the President may be better enabled to judge of the matter.

XVII. When a blank is to be filled, and different sums shall be proposed, the question shall be taken on the highest sum first.

XVIII. No Member shall absent himself from the service of the Senate without leave of the Senate first obtained. And in case a less number than a quorum of the Senate shall convene, they are hereby authorized to send the Sergeant at Arms, or any other person or persons by them authorized, for any or all absent Members, as the majority of such Members present shall agree, at the expense of such absent Members, respectively, unless such excuse for nonattendance shall be made, as the Senate, when a quorum is convened, shall judge sufficient; and in that case the expense shall be paid out of the contingent fund. And this rule shall apply as well to the first convention of Senate, at the legal time of meeting, as to each day of the session after the hour has arrived to which the Senate stood adjourned.

XIX. All bills on a second reading shall first be considered by the Senate in the same manner as if the Senate were in a Committee of the Whole before they shall be taken up and proceeded on by the Senate, agreeably to the standing rules, unless otherwise ordered. And in the absence of the Vice President, when the Senate consider a treaty, bill, or resolution, as if they were in Committee of the Whole, the President pro tempore may call a Member to fill the chair during the time the Senate shall remain in Committee of the Whole; which chairman is hereby vested, during said time, with all the powers of the President pro tempore, were he to remain in the chair.

XX. Before any petition or memorial addressed to the Senate shall be received and read at the table, whether the same shall be introduced by the President or a Member, a brief statement of the contents of the petition or memorial shall verbally be made by the introductor.

XXI. When a question has been once made and carried in the affirmative or negative it shall be in order for any Member of the majority to move for the reconsideration thereof; but no motion for the reconsideration of any vote shall be in order after a bill, resolution, message, report, amendment, or motion upon which the vote was taken shall have gone out of possession of the Senate, nor after the usual message shall have been sent from the Senate announcing their decision; nor shall any motion for reconsideration be in order unless made on the same day in which the vote was taken, or within the three next days of actual session of the Senate thereafter.

XXII. At the commencement of each session a committee, consisting of three Members, shall be appointed, whose duty it shall be to examine all bills, amendments, resolutions, or motions before they go out of possession of the Senate, and to make report that they are correctly engrossed, which report shall be entered on the Journal.

XXIII. Every vote of the Senate shall be entered on the Journals, and a brief statement of the contents of each petition, memorial, or paper presented to the Senate be also inserted on the Journals.

XXIV. The proceedings of the Senate when they shall act in their executive capacity shall be kept in separate and distinct books.

XXV. The proceedings of the Senate when not acting as in a Committee of the Whole shall be entered on the Journals as concisely as possible, care being taken to detail a true and accurate account of the proceedings.

XXVI. The titles of bills, and such parts thereof only as shall be affected by proposed amendments, shall be inserted on the Journals.

XXVII. On a motion made and seconded to shut the doors of the Senate on the discussion of any business which may, in the opinion of a Member, require secrecy, the President shall direct the gallery to be cleared, and during the discussion of such motion the doors shall remain shut.

XXVIII. No motion shall be deemed in order to admit any person or persons whatsoever within the doors of the Senate Chamber to present any petition, memorial, or address, or to hear any such read.

XXIX. Messages shall be sent to the House of Representatives by the Secretary, who shall previously indorse the final determination of the Senate thereon.

XXX. Messages sent from the House of Representatives by their Clerk shall be received at the bar by the Secretary, and by him be delivered to the President of the Senate.

XXXI. When the Senate are equally divided, the Secretary shall take the decision of the President.

XXXII. Extracts from the executive records are not to be furnished but by special order.

XXXIII. All bills, after the first reading, shall be printed for the use of the Senate.

XXXIV. When nominations shall be made in writing by the President of the United States to the Senate, a future day shall be assigned, unless the Senate unanimously direct otherwise, for taking them into consideration. When the President of the United States shall meet the Senate in the Senate Chamber, the President of the Senate shall have a chair on the floor, be considered as the head of the Senate, and his chair shall be assigned to the President of the United States. When the Senate shall be convened by the President of the United States to any other place, the President of the Senate and Senators shall attend at the place appointed. The Secretary of the Senate shall also attend to take the minutes of the Senate.

XXXV. All questions shall be put by the President of the Senate, either in the presence or absence of the President of the United States; and the Senators shall signify their assent or dissent by answering, viva voce, "aye" or "no."

XXXVI. All confidential communications made by the President of the United States to the Senate shall be, by the Members thereof, kept inviolably secret; and all treaties which may hereafter be laid before the Senate shall also be kept secret until the Senate shall, by their resolution, take off the injunction of secrecy.

XXXVII. Whenever a treaty shall be laid before the Senate for ratification, it shall be read a first time for information only; when no motion to reject, ratify, or modify the whole or any part shall be received. Its second reading shall be for consideration, and on a subsequent day; when it shall be taken up as in a Committee of the Whole, and everyone shall be free to move a question on any particular article in this form, "Will the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of this article?" or to propose amendments thereto, either by inserting or leaving out words, in which last case the question shall be, "Shall these words stand as part of the article?" And in every of the said cases the concurrence of two-thirds of the Senators present shall be requisite to decide affirmatively. And when, through the whole, the proceedings shall be stated to the House, and questions be again severally put thereon for confirmation, or new ones proposed, requiring in like manner a concurrence of two-thirds for whatever is retained, the votes so confirmed shall, by the House, or a committee thereof, be reduced into the form of a ratification, with or without modifications, as may have been decided and shall be proposed on a subsequent day; when everyone shall again be free to move amendments, either by inserting or leaving out words, in which last case the question shall be, "Shall the words stand as part of the resolution?" And in both cases the concurrence of two-thirds shall be requisite to carry the affirmative, as well as on the final question to advise and consent to the ratification in the form agreed to.

XXXVIII. When any question may have been decided by the Senate, in which two-thirds of the Members present are necessary to carry the affirmative, any Member who votes on that side which prevailed in the question may be at liberty to move for a reconsideration; and a motion for reconsideration shall be decided by a majority of votes.

XXXIX. Messengers are introduced in any state of business except while a question is putting, while the yeas and nays are calling, or while the ballots are calling.

XL. When an amendment to be proposed to the Constitution is under consideration the concurrence of two-thirds of the Members present shall not be requisite to decide any question for amendments, or extending to the merits, being short of the final question.

Mr. LODGE. I call attention to Rule VIII, which covers the point we are now considering:

VIII. While a question is before the Senate no motion shall be received unless for an amendment, for postponing the question, or to commit it, or to adjourn; and the motion for adjournment shall always be in order and decided without debate.

It will be observed that the motion for the previous question disappears. It is not the mere leaving of a blank——

Mr. BRANDEGEE. It not only disappears, but it is prohibited.

Mr. LODGE. I was going to say that it does not merely disappear, but it is prohibited by its omission, because only those motions can be put which are enumerated; and they are enumerated here in Rule VIII and to-day in our Rule XXII.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will call the attention——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the fact that when that change was made the word "main" was also dropped from the rule.

Mr. LODGE. That is perfectly true; the word "main" was left out before the word "question" in the phrase "for postponing the question." So that the Senate took out the last vestige of the previous question and made it impossible to offer such a motion, because the motions that could be offered were enumerated, as I have said.

There are no debates given. I have read all that occurred in regard to the rules. I have looked in the diary of John Quincy Adams, who was a member of the committee, but he merely mentions the fact once or twice that he was on the committee and that they were revising the rules; but of course the experienced men on that committee knew perfectly well what they were doing. They did not leave out the previous question and the word "main" by accident. They meant to leave them out and they meant to establish the rule in such a way that they could not be brought back without a change in the rule, and that they effected.

I have not undertaken to follow this question down to the most recent times, but I turned to Benton's Thirty Years in the United States Senate to see if by chance there was anything in that period relating to this discussion; and I found that in the second volume, page 247, he devotes an entire chapter—chapter 69—to this question. The House had just established the hour rule in debate. I ought to say, as a preliminary, that the Whigs were in full control of both Houses. They had just carried the election of 1840, and the House established this hour rule. Mr. Clay, who was greatly annoyed by the delays caused by the Democratic minority in the Senate, proposed to establish the hour rule in the Senate which the House had just taken up. I will cut the story short. Finding himself unable to do that, he then tried the previous question, and he failed in that also.

Benton gives a very amusing account, in his own way—not intentionally amusing—of the whole thing. I am not going to read the whole of it, although it is well worth reading. It has the usual classical allusions which were the fashion in that day. You all remember that it was at that precise time when Webster came away from discussing President Harrison's inaugural, and they asked him what he had been doing, and he said he had had a weary afternoon; he had killed 17 Roman proconsuls. So I leave out the beginning here, where he refers to Cæsar, Pompey, and Crassus, and just select such passages as illustrate what we are doing now.

Benton says:

No doubt the license of debate has been greatly abused in our Halls of Congress, as in those of the British Parliament; but this suppression of debate is not the correction of the abuse, but the destruction of the liberty of speech; and that, not as a personal privilege but as a representative right, essential to the welfare of the people. For 50 years of our Government there was no such suppression * * *.

Then, having sketched what had happened in the House, he says:

The measure having succeeded in the House which made the majority master of the body, and enabled them to pass their bills without resistance or exposure, Mr. Clay undertook to do the same thing in the Senate. He was impatient to pass his bills, annoyed at the resistance they met, and dreadfully harassed by the species of warfare to which they were subjected and for which he had no turn. The Democratic Senators acted upon a system, and with a thorough organization and a perfect understanding. Being a minority and able to do nothing, they became assailants, and attacked incessantly, not by formal orations against the whole body of a measure but by sudden, short, and pungent speeches, directed against the vulnerable parts, and pointed by proffered amendments. Amendments were continually offered—a great number being prepared every night and placed in suitable hands for use the next day—always commendably calculated to expose an evil and to present a remedy. Near 40 propositions of amendment were offered to the first fiscal agent bill alone—the yeas and nays taken upon them seven and thirty times.

They did not have our rule about laying amendments on the table without carrying the main question.

All the other prominent bills—distribution, bankrupt, fiscal corporation, new tariff act, called revenue—were served the same way. Every proposed amendment made an issue, which fixed public attention, and would work out in our favor, end as it might. If we carried it, which was seldom, there was a good point gained; if we lost it, there was a bad point exposed. In either event we had the advantage of discussion, which placed our adversaries in the wrong, and the speaking fact of the yeas and nays, which told how every man was upon every point. We had in our ranks every variety of speaking talent, from plain and calm up to fiery and brilliant, and all matter-of-fact men—their heads well stored with knowledge. There were but 22 of us, but everyone a speaker, and effective. We kept their measures upon the anvil and hammered them continually; we impaled them against the wall and stabbed them incessantly. The Globe newspaper was a powerful ally, Messrs. Blair and Rives setting off all we did to the best advantage in strong editorials, and carrying out our speeches, fresh and hot, to the people; and we felt victorious in the midst of unbroken defeats. Mr. Clay's temperament could not stand it, and he was determined to silence the troublesome minority, and got the acquiescence of his party and the promise of their support, and boldly commenced his operations, avowing his design, at the same time, in open Senate.

It was on the 12th day of July—just four days after the new rule had been enforced in the House and thereby established—for up to that day it was doubtful whether it could be enforced—that Mr. Clay made his first movement toward its introduction in the Senate, and in reply to Mr. Wright, of New York.

I assume that was "Silas Wright."

Mr. GALLINGER. It was "Silas Wright."

Mr. LODGE (reading)—

One of the last men in the world to waste time in the Senate or to speak without edification to those who would listen. It was on the famous fiscal bank bill, and on motion of Mr. Wright to strike out the large subscription reserved for the Government, so as to keep the Government unconnected with the business of the bank. The mover made some remarks in favor of his motion, to which Mr. Clay replied, and then went on to say—

If I could close my eyes and repeat this, I should almost think I had heard the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]—

He could not help regarding the opposition to this measure as one eminently calculated to delay the public business with no other object that he could see than that of protracting to the last moment the measures for which this session had been expressly called to give to the people. This, too, was at a time when the whole country was crying out in an agony of distress for relief.

Then follows some more of similar purport, but I will only read this:

Mr. Calhoun observed that to attempt, by such charges of factious and frivolous motives, to silence the opposition was wholly useless. He and his friends had principles to contend for that were neither new nor frivolous, and they would here now, and at all times and in all places, maintain them against those measures in whatever way they thought most efficient. Did the Senator from Kentucky mean to apply to the Senate the gag law passed in the other branch of Congress? If he did, it was time he should know that he (Mr. Calhoun) and his friends were ready to meet him on that point.

This question, and the avowed readiness to meet the gagging attempt, were not spoken without warrant. The Democratic Senators having got wind of what was to come had consulted together and taken their resolve to defy and to dare it—to resist its introduction and trample upon the rule, if voted; and in the meantime to gain an advantage with the public by rendering odious their attempt. Mr. Clay answered argumentatively for the rule, and that the people were for it:

Let those Senators go into the country, and they will find the whole body of the people complaining of the delay and interruption of the national business, by their long speeches in Congress; and if they will be but admonished by the people, they will come back with a lesson to cut short their debating and give their attention more to action than to words. Whoever heard that the people would be dissatisfied with the abridgment of speeches in Congress? He had never heard the shortness of speeches complained of. Indeed, he should not be surprised if the people would get up remonstrances against lengthy speeches in Congress.

With respect to the defiance, Mr. Clay returned it, and declared his determination to bring forward the measure.

With regard to the intimation of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Calhoun], he understood him and his course perfectly well, and told him and his friends that, for himself, he knew not how his friends would act; he was ready at any moment to bring forward and support a measure which should give to the majority the control of the business of the Senate of the United States. Let them denounce it as much as they pleased in advance; unmoved by any of their denunciations and threats, standing firm in the support of the interests which he believed the country demands, for one he was ready for the adoption of a rule which would place the business of the Senate under the control of a majority of the Senate.

Mr. Clay was now committed to bring forward the measure, and was instantly and defyingly invited to do so.

Mr. Calhoun said there was no doubt of the Senator's predilection for a gag law. Let him bring on that measure as soon as ever he pleases.

Mr. BENTON. Come on with it.

Without waiting for anything further from Mr. Clay, Mr. Calhoun proceeded to show him, still further, how little his threat was heeded, and taunted him with wishing to revive the spirit of the alien and sedition laws.

Mr. Calhoun said it must be admitted that if the Senator was not acting on the Federal side, he would find it hard to persuade the American people of the fact, by showing them his love of gag laws and strong disposition to silence both the national councils and the press. Did he not remember something about an alien and sedition law, and can he fail to perceive the relationship with the measure he contemplates to put down debate here? What is the difference, in principle, between his gag law and the alien and sedition law? We are gravely told that the speaking of the representatives of the people, which is to convey to them full information on the subjects of legislation in their councils, is worse than useless and must be abated. Who consumed the time of last Congress in long speeches, vexatious and frivolous attempts to embarrass and thwart the business of the country, and useless opposition, tending to no end but that out of doors, the presidential election? Who but the Senator and his party, then in the minority? But now, when they are in the majority, and the most important measures ever pressed forward together in one session, he is the first to threaten a gag law, to choke off debate, and deprive the minority even of the poor privilege of entering their protest.

This is Mr. Calhoun. Benton gives some of the speech of Mr. Linn, and then he says:

Here this irritating point rested for the day, and for three days, when it was revived by the reproaches and threats of Mr. Clay against the minority.

The House, he said, had been treading on the heels of the Senate, and at last had got the start of it a long way in advance of the business of this session. The reason was obvious. The majority there is for action, and has secured it. Some change was called for in this Chamber. The truth is that the minority here control the action of the Senate, and cause all the delay of the public business. They obstruct the majority in the dispatch of all business of importance to the country, and particularly those measures which the majority is bound to give to the country without further delay. Did not this reduce the majority to the necessity of adopting some measure which would place the control of the business of the session in their hands? It was impossible to do without it; it must be resorted to.

To this Mr. Calhoun replied:

"The Senator from Kentucky tells the Senate the other House has got before it. How has the other House got before the Senate? By a despotic exercise of the power of a majority. By destroying the liberties of the people in gagging their representatives. By preventing the minority from its free exercise of its right of remonstrance. This is the way the House has got before the Senate. And now there is too much evidence to doubt that the Senate is to be made to keep up with the House by the same means."

Mr. Clay, finding such undaunted opposition to the hour rule, replied in a way to let it be seen that the threat of that rule was given up, and that a measure of a different kind, but equally effective, was to be proposed, and would be certainly adopted.

Mr. Clay gave up the hour rule and substituted the previous question, which Mr. Benton says Mr. Clay regarded as a compromise. Of course, it went much further than the hour rule.

He said if he did not adopt the same which had proved so beneficial in the other House, he would have something equally efficient to offer. He had no doubt of the cheerful adoption of such a measure when it should come before the Senate. So far from the rule being condemned, he would venture to say that it would be generally approved. It was the means of controlling the business, abridging long and unnecessary speeches, and would be every way hailed as one of the greatest improvements of the age.

This glimpse of another measure, confirmed the minority in the belief of what they had heard—that several Whig Senators had refused to go with Mr. Clay for the hour rule, and forced him to give it up; but they had agreed to go for the previous question, which he held to be equally effective; and was, in fact, more so, as it cut off debate at any moment. It was just as offensive as the other. Mr. King, of Alabama, was the first to meet the threat, under this new form, and the Register of Debates shows this scene:

Mr. King said the Senator from Kentucky complained of three weeks and a half having been lost in amendments to his bill. Was not the Senator aware that it was himself and his friends had consumed most of that time? But now that the minority had to take it up, the Senate is told there must be a gag law. Did he understand that it was the intention of the Senator to introduce that measure?

Mr. CLAY. I will, sir; I will!

Mr. KING. I tell the Senator, then, that he may make his arrangements at his boarding house for the winter.

Mr. CLAY. Very well, sir.

Mr. King was truly sorry to see the honorable Senator so far forgetting what is due to the Senate, as to talk of coercing it by any possible abridgment of its free action. The freedom of debate had never yet been abridged in that body since the foundation of this Government. Was it fit or becoming, after 50 years of unrestrained liberty, to threaten it with a gag law? He could tell the Senator that, peaceable a man as he (Mr. King) was, whenever it was attempted to violate that sanctuary, he for one would resist that attempt even unto the death.

The issue was now made up, and the determination on both sides declared, on the part of Mr. Clay, speaking in the name of his party, to introduce the previous question in the Senate, for the purpose of cutting off debate and amendments; on the part of the minority, to resist the rule, not only its establishment but its execution. This was a delicate step, and required justification before the public, before a scene of resistance to the execution—involving disorder and possibly violence—should come on. The scheme had been denounced and defied; but the ample reasons against it had not been fully stated; and it was deemed best that a solid foundation of justification for whatever might happen should be laid beforehand in a reasoned and considered speech. The author of this view was required to make that speech, and for that purpose followed Mr. King.

Then Mr. Benton himself follows Mr. King. He says that he was put forward to represent their side, a view of himself which I think Mr. Benton frequently took, and he said a good many rather amusing things, but I will read only one or two passages:

Mr. Benton would take this opportunity to say a word on this menace, so often thrown out, of a design to stifle debate and stop amendments to bills in this Chamber. He should consider such an attempt as much a violation of the Constitution and of the privileges of the Chamber as it would be for a military usurper to enter upon us at the head of his soldiery and expel us from our seats.

"It is not in order," continued Mr. Benton; "it is not in order, and would be a breach of the privilege of the House of Representatives to refer to anything which may have taken place in that House. My business is with our own Chamber, and with the threat which has so often been uttered on this floor, during this extra session, of stifling debate and cutting off amendments by the introduction of the previous question."

* * * * * * * *

"The Government has been in operation above 50 years, and the freedom of debate has been sometimes abused, especially during the last 12 years, when those out of power made the two Houses of Congress the arena of political and electioneering combat against the Democratic administration in power. The liberty of debate was abused during this time, but the Democratic majority would not impose gags and muzzles on the mouths of the minority; they would not stop their speeches, considering, and justly considering, that the privilege of speech was inestimable and inattackable; that some abuse of it was inseparable from its enjoyment; and that it was better to endure a temporary abuse than to incur a total extinction of this great privilege."

He then discusses at some length the previous question, as follows:

"The previous question cuts off amendments; and therefore, neither in England or in the United States, until now, in the House of Representatives, has that question ever been applied to bills in the Committee of the Whole, on the second reading. This question annihilates legislation, sets at nought the wisdom of the House, and expunges the minority. It is always an invidious question, but seldom enforced in England, and but little used in the earlier periods of our own Government. It has never been used in the Senate at all, never at any stage of the bill; in the House of Representatives it has never been used on the second reading of a bill, in Committee of the Whole, until the present session—this session, so ominous in its call and commencement, and which gives daily proof of its alarming tendencies, and of its unconstitutional, dangerous, and corrupting measures. The previous question has never yet been applied in this Chamber; and to apply it now, at this ominous session, when all the old Federal measures of 50 years ago are to be conglomerated into one huge and frightful mass, and rushed through by one convulsive effort; to apply it now, under such circumstances, is to muzzle the mouths, to gag the jaws, and tie up the tongues of those whose speeches would expose the enormities which can not endure the light, and present to the people these ruinous measures in the colors in which they ought to be seen.

"The opinion of the people is invoked—they are said to be opposed to long speeches, and in favor of action. But do they want action without deliberation, without consideration, without knowing what we are doing? Do they want bills without amendments—without examination of details; without a knowledge of their effect and operation when they are passed? Certainly the people wish no such thing. They want nothing which will not bear discussion. The people are in favor of discussion, and never read our debates with more avidity than at this ominous and critical extraordinary session. But I can well conceive of those who are against those debates, and want them stifled. Old sedition law federalism is against them; the cormorants who are whetting their bills for the prey which the acts of this session are to give them, are against them; and the advocates of these acts, who can not answer these arguments, and who shelter weakness under dignified silence, they are all weary, sick, and tired of a contest which rages on one side only, and which exposes at once the badness of their cause and the defeat of its defenders. Sir, this call for action! action! action!—as it was well said yesterday—comes from those whose cry is Plunder! Plunder! Plunder!"

He took a somewhat dark view of the Whigs.

"The previous question and the old sedition law are measures of the same character, and children of the same parents, and intended for the same purposes. They are to hide light; to enable those in power to work in darkness; to enable them to proceed unmolested; and to permit them to establish ruinous measures without stint and without detection. The introduction of this previous question into this body, I shall resist as I would resist its conversion into a bed of justice—lit de justice—of the old French monarchy for the registration of royal edicts. In these beds of justice—the Parliament formed into a bed of justice—the kings before the revolution caused their edicts to be registered without debate and without amendment. The King ordered it, and it was done—his word became law. On one occasion when the Parliament was refractory Louis XIV entered the chamber, booted and spurred, a whip in his hand—a horsewhip in his hand—and stood on his feet until the edict was registered. This is what has been done in the way of passing bills without debate or amendment in France. But in extenuation of this conduct of Louis XIV, it must be remembered that he was a very young man when he committed this indiscretion, more derogatory to himself than to the Parliament which was the subject of the indignity. He never repeated it in his riper age, for he was a gentleman as well as a king, and in a 50 years' reign never repeated that indiscretion of his youth. True, no whips may be brought into our legislative halls to enforce the gag and the muzzle, but I go against the things themselves; against the infringement of the right of speech; and against the annihilation of our legislative faculties by annihilating the right of making amendments. I go against these; and say that we shall be nothing but a bed of justice for the registration of presidential or partisan or civil chieftain edicts when debates and amendments are suppressed in this body.

"Sir, when the previous question shall be brought into this Chamber—when it shall be applied to our bills in our quasi committee—I am ready to see my legislative life terminated. I want no seat here when that shall be the case. As the Romans held their natural lives, so do I hold my political existence. The Roman carried his life on the point of his sword; and when that life ceased to be honorable to himself or useful to his country he fell upon his sword and died. This made of that people the most warlike and heroic nation of the earth. What they did with their natural lives I am willing to do with my legislative and political existence; I am willing to terminate it either when it shall cease to be honorable to myself or useful to my country; and that I feel would be the case when this Chamber, stripped of its constitutional freedom, shall receive the gag and muzzle of the previous question."

Mr. HUGHES. Who was that?

Mr. LODGE. Thomas H. Benton, of Missouri.

Mr. GALLINGER. A good Democrat.

Mr. OVERMAN. He was born in North Carolina.

Mr. LODGE. A very distinguished Senator in his day, and a very able man. Then Mr. Calhoun follows, and Mr. Calhoun is always interesting:

He thought this business closely analogous to the alien and sedition laws. Here was a palpable attempt to infringe the right of speech. He would tell the Senator that the minority had rights under the Constitution which they meant to exercise, and let the Senator try when he pleased to abridge those rights, he would find it no easy job. When had that (our) side of the Senate ever sought to protract discussion unnecessarily? [Cries of "Never! Never!"] Where was there a body that had less abused its privileges? If the gag law was attempted to be put in force, he would resist it to the last. As judgment had been pronounced, he supposed submission was expected. The unrestrained liberty of speech, and freedom of debate had been preserved in the Senate for 50 years. But now the warning was given that the yoke was to be put on it which had already been placed on the other branch of Congress. There never had been a body in this or any other country, in which, for such a length of time, so much dignity and decorum of debate had been maintained. It was remarkable for the fact the range of discussion was less discursive than in any other similar body known. Speeches were uniformly confined to the subject under debate. There could be no protext for interference. There was none but that of all despotisms. He would give the Senator from Kentucky notice to bring on his gag measure as soon as he pleased. He would find it no such easy matter as he seemed to think.

Later Mr. Calhoun returned to the point, and said:

The Senator from Kentucky had endeavored to draw a distinction between the gag law and the old sedition law. He (Mr. Calhoun) admitted there was a distinction—the modern gag law was by far the most odious. The sedition law was an attempt to gag the people in their individual character, but the Senator's gag was an attempt to gag the representatives of the people, selected as their agents to deliberate, discuss, and decide on the important subjects intrusted by them to this Government.

This was a taunt, and Senators looked to see what would follow. Mr. Clay rose, leisurely, and, surveying the Chamber with a pleasant expression of countenance, said:

The morning had been spent so very agreeably, that he hoped the gentlemen were in a good humor to go on with the loan bill, and afford the necessary relief to the Treasury.

The loan bill was then taken up and proceeded with in a most business style, and quite amicably. And this was the last that was heard of the hour rule and the previous question in the Senate; and the secret history of their silent abandonment was afterwards fully learned. Several Whig Senators had yielded assent to Mr. Clay's desire for the hour rule under the belief that it would only be resisted parliamentarily by the minority; but when they saw its introduction was to produce ill blood and disagreeable scenes in the Chamber, they withdrew their assent, and left him without the votes to carry it; and that put an end to the project of the hour rule. The previous question was then agreed to in its place, supposing the minority would take it as a "compromise"; but when they found this measure was to be resisted like the former, and was deemed still more odious, hurtful, and degrading, they withdrew their assent again; and then Mr. Clay, brought to a stand again for want of voters, was compelled to forego his design, and to retreat from it in the manner which has been shown.

So that great attempt, made under the leadership of one of the most brilliant men and most popular leaders this country has ever had, failed, and somehow or other the country has gone on for 75 years since that failure pretty cheerfully and well. It has not been materially hurt, and a good deal of business has been transacted and many laws passed in the Senate.

I am aware that except as a picture of the struggle, which is historically interesting, this debate of 1841 has no particular bearing as an authority upon the question now before us except in one way. It will be observed that every one of the speakers in opposition alludes to the fact that it never had been applied for 50 years, and they were all Democrats and all engaged in obstruction. That covered, then, the whole life of the Senate. I have not had the time to go through the Journals from 1789 to 1806, so that I can not say whether it was ever used as provided for in the rules of 1789.

Mr. GALLINGER. It was used three times during that period.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from New Hampshire says it was used three times during that period, but evidently it was used so slightly that it made no impression, and every one of those who opposed the previous question states broadly that it never had been used. It never has been used since 1806, 100 years ago, when those rules were adopted by the Senate of the United States. It can be adopted now only by changing Rule XXII. No temporary rule can do it except by suspending Rule XXII.

The Senators of 1806 knew perfectly well what they were about. They not only took out the previous question and the word "main," as I have already said, but they provided strictly what motions should be in order. The previous question can not be put without an absolute disregard of the rules of the Senate as the rules stand to-day. It can be established, undoubtedly, by the Senate acting in the way prescribed for changing or amending the rules, and through the medium, I should hope, of its proper organ, the Committee on Rules, but it can not be done by a so-called amendment to the standing rules which suspends the rules or makes a special order, which both require a two-thirds vote. It is in the nature of a special order, because it fixes a time not only for voting but for the consideration of a subject. The previous question can not be imposed by a special order, which, under the guise of an amendment to the standing rules, undertakes to suspend Rule XXII.

Mr. President, I do not wish to enter further into that point to-day.

Mr. THOMAS and Mr. HUGHES addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado.

Mr. LODGE. I yield for a question.

Mr. THOMAS. I thought the Senator had yielded the floor.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no; I said I would speak no further on that point.

Mr. THOMAS. I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; the Senator very naturally did so.

Neither do I desire, Mr. President, to discuss fully to-day the general question of cloture or previous question. I prefer previous question as the expression familiar to our parliamentary law. That is a very large subject. It consumed the time of the House through a large part of one session when I first entered Congress. But I wish before I sit down to-day to make a brief statement in regard to myself and my course on this question.

I entered the Senate and was sworn in on the 4th of March, 1893. I came here on the 7th of August, 1893, to the Congress called in special session to repeal the silver-purchase act. I was just from the House, fresh from the great struggle in which, under the leadership of Mr. Reed, the rules had been changed, and I was of opinion that that same thing ought to be done everywhere. I promptly introduced a resolution for the purpose of bringing the silver question to an immediate vote. I remember to this day the kindly smile with which Senator Teller, who was the leader of the silver men, regarded me. He evidently thought me very, very young, and so I was in the Senate. That resolution of mine drifted off on the stream of time and was disposed of in ways with which I was not then familiar but which I came afterwards to know better.

About the same time I wrote an article on Obstruction in the Senate. I think it was just at that time. I felt perfectly confident that both the resolution and the article would make their appearance in the Senate in this debate—something which did not trouble me in the least, for I think nothing is of less importance in considering any public question than to say that some individual who is discussing it has changed his mind. The fact that a man has changed his mind has but little to do with the intrinsic merits of a given case, unless it is thought that he has changed his position on good grounds which justify the attitude which he and others are taking at the moment.

Mr. President, having stated that general proposition, I desire to call attention to this fact: When I wrote that article and when I offered that resolution the Democratic Party was in the majority in this body. So it could not be suggested that I was making it for party reasons. I changed my mind not very long after 1893; but it so happens that 10 years afterwards, in 1903, the matter came up, and I had occasion to make a brief speech, in which I explained that I had changed my mind. When I made that speech in behalf of maintaining the existing rules and customs of the Senate my own party was in full control and in a large majority. So whatever else I changed my mind for, I did not change it for party benefit, because when I advocated cloture the Democrats were in control, and when I opposed it publicly—although I had been against it for some time—my own party had a large majority. This is what I said:

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, when I entered the Senate I came here fresh from the greatest contest that had been made in the House of Representatives, certainly in this generation, and which involved the question of cloture or of the previous question. Stated more broadly, the issue was whether the majority in the House of Representatives was to transact any business at all. The House of Representatives, when I entered it, was under the old system of rules, and had fallen into a condition where practically one man could arrest the business of the House by an apt use of complicated rules and long roll calls. I was in the House which revised the old rules and adopted what were known as the Reed rules, which, in my judgment, were the salvation of the House of Representatives and of its position as a legislative body, for under the old rules it had fallen into a state of almost complete inanity. Therefore I came to this body with a very strong prejudice in favor of vigorous and prompt methods of closing debate.

I entered the Senate with all these opinions very strongly upon me, and I remember on August 7, 1893, or immediately afterwards, when we assembled in extra session, I introduced a resolution to compel the Committee on Finance immediately to report a bill for the repeal of the Sherman law, moved thereto by the discipline which I had received in the House. That motion was met by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. Teller] as an impossible method of procedure, and with much the same argument that he has repeated here to-day.

Mr. President, I have been here since then for 10 years. In a very short time after my coming into this body, within a year or two, in fact, I came to the conclusion that the practice of the Senate was on the whole a wise one, and though hard at times to bear when we are interested in passing a bill and grow naturally impatient, that it was the safest system for the country and for the general interests of the Government. Mr. President, I have seen in that short time both parties in control of the Senate, and I do not remember that any measure desired by an actual and true majority of the Senate has ever failed of a vote.

In the first session of the Senate a previous question was adopted which could be applied, by a majority vote, if moved and seconded from the floor. In 1806 the Senate struck that provision from the rules, and for a hundred years has never reenacted it. I think the principle involved, therefore, ought not to be lightly set aside, for there is much to be said in behalf of the practice of a hundred years. Moreover, Mr. President, as I was just saying, in that long period and in late years it has been clear that the majority of the Senate always gets a vote when it is a real majority.

Mr. President, I believe thoroughly in majority rule. I had that lesson borne in upon me in my service in the House of Representatives; but those who invoke majority rule, Mr. President, must not begin by overthrowing it. This country intrusts the Government to one political party or the other, and the party in power is responsible for the Government, and is the majority party. If a bill passes this Congress, it makes no difference by what combination of votes it passes, the party in power at the moment, which now happens to the Republican Party, is held responsible for it, even if the great mass of their Members and Senators voted against it.

A bill, for example, came to this table the other day from the other House settling the currency of the Philippine Islands. It was passed there by the minority party acting with a small fraction of the majority party; that is, the party to whom was intrusted the Government of the country was, under that vote, to be made responsible for a measure to which the great majority of its members objected, and which they did not believe in.

Therefore, Mr. President, a majority in this Senate must be something more than a numerical majority at any given moment, and there must be time to develop the fact whether it is a genuine and responsible majority, and also whether votes can not be changed.

I was deeply and profoundly interested in the force bill, as it was called, which has been alluded to here. I had it in charge in the House of Representatives and I saw it defeated on this floor by methods of obstruction, which resulted finally in the change of votes which has been here alluded to. But, Mr. President, I had much rather take the chances of occasional obstruction than to put the Senate in the position where bills could be driven through under rules which may be absolutely necessary in a large body like the House of Representatives or the House of Commons in England, but which are not necessary here. I think here we should have, minority and majority alike, the fullest possible opportunity of debate.

I myself have never indulged in obstruction and I have no desire to indulge in it now, but I think, Mr. President, that it would be the height of unwisdom to pass a resolution like this and open the way to a closure rule, which is what this resolution does, and which is a matter of the utmost gravity, without more consideration than can be given in the morning hour. Those whom it most behooves to oppose such resolutions as this are the party of the minority, for it is the minority whose rights are at stake and whose last protection is found on the floor of this Senate.

Mr. President, those are the views which I expressed in 1903, and I have not changed them since that time. I think we are sound still. As it was thought important on the other side to bring forward what I had done in October, 1893, and the article which I had written at that time—I have not seen it for a great many years, but I have an impression it was a very good one, and as they saw fit to avail themselves of it, which I think is a compliment—it seems to me not without relevancy to explain the reasons for my change of mind, which were, as I said, given in the speech from which I just quoted, and which I think I have covered in the quotation I have made. Mr. President, that is all I desire to say to-day. To me this matter of a change of the rules of the Senate which have been in force in this respect for 109 years is a matter of very grave moment indeed. I think if a change from our present system to the previous question, like that of the House, is put in operation it is going to alter completely the character of the Senate.

Now, without arguing the merits of the question at this moment, this is a change so serious that it ought to have the most thorough and the fullest consideration of every Senator on the floor. Every Senator ought to think well before he makes a change of this sort in the very constitution of the Senate for the sake of passing, in a moment of heat and passion over a single bill, a measure which strikes at that quality which has been more distinctive of the Senate than any other body in parliamentary history and which to-day is the only refuge the people of this country have who desire to know something about the measures before their Representatives. The people of this country have the right to know the reasons for and against every important measure, for in no other way can they rightly judge.

At this moment, as an illustration of the evil I refer to, they are proposing to take up this great measure in the House of Representatives and dispose of it in six hours. Surely that is an illustration of the evil in the other direction—the evil of putting through great measures under drastic rules and without discussion. I believe this to be a much worse evil than that which these efforts to introduce the previous question here are designed to remedy.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, my purpose in rising a few moments ago was to refer to the subject which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] immediately considered. I designed calling attention to the views of the Senator upon this subject on the 21st day of September, 1893.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, I have just done that; but, of course, I would be delighted to have it done again.

Mr. THOMAS. I made the statement that the Senator had anticipated me to the extent of informing the Senate that his views had undergone a complete change. Nevertheless, Mr. President, I find the other side so well stated, and to my mind so conclusively stated, by the Senator on the floor of the Senate on the 21st of September, 1893, that, notwithstanding his own change of heart, I think those of us who are still obdurate can find much comfort in referring to it as presenting the question much better than any of us are able to do. The Senator has changed his views, but he can not change the force of his former arguments.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to make only a single remark.

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. I am delighted to have the Senator read the speech and put it in the RECORD. I dare say it expresses the argument on that side very well. But I think the Senator was anticipated by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] on Saturday.

Mr. THOMAS. No; the Senator from Oklahoma did not refer to this particular speech.

Mr. LODGE. I would be very glad to have everything I said put in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey in the chair). The Senator from Colorado will proceed.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I do not propose to do that; the RECORD is already somewhat encumbered; but I think this speech should be incorporated as one of the many excellent arguments which have fallen from the lips of the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts. It was made before he saw the new light which seems to have found its inspiration from the utterances of John C. Calhoun and other great Democratic figures of history, whose doctrines have not been particularly palatable to the Senator. But his ante-conviction argument should be kept fresh before the public mind that we who believe in cloture may justify ourselves by his example.

On the 21st of September, 1893, the Senator from Connecticut, Mr. Platt, introduced a resolution which read as follows:

Resolved, That Rule IX of the Senate be amended by adding the following section:

"SEC. 2. Whenever any bill or resolution is pending before the Senate as unfinished business, the presiding officer shall, upon the written request of a majority of the Senators, fix a day and hour, and notify the Senate thereof, when general debate shall cease thereon, which time shall not be less than five days from the submission of such request; and he shall also fix a subsequent day and hour, and notify the Senate thereof, when the vote shall be taken on the bill or resolution, and any amendment thereto, without further debate; the time for taking the vote to be not more than two days later than the time when general debate is to cease; and in the interval between the closing of general debate and the taking of the vote no Senator shall speak more than five minutes, nor more than once, upon the same proposition."

At that time, Mr. President, a filibuster was on in this body. It was conducted by Republicans and Democrats forming a minority of the Senate, but intent upon defeating the bill which had passed the House and which provided for the unconditional repeal of the purchasing clause of what was known as the Sherman Silver-Purchase Act. The special session of Congress then in session had been convened, as I remember, for the 7th day of August. It had therefore been in session for about a month and a half and had made no progress. A number of resolutions amending the rules, of which that by the Senator from Connecticut was one, had been suggested. The Senator from Connecticut spoke in behalf of his own proposition, and I quote a part of his argument because of its pertinency to the present situation. He said:

Next comes what is sometimes known as the process of "sitting it out"—

We might, perhaps, refer to the proceedings of last week as "running it out," because we have been running out of the Senate most of the time and running in only for the purpose of answering to roll calls.

Next comes what is sometimes known as the process of "sitting it out"; that is, for the friends of a bill to remain in continuous session until the opponents of it are so physically exhausted that they can not struggle any longer. That may or may not result in a vote either upon this measure or upon any great measure upon which a determined contest is made. It did not result in reaching a vote upon the consideration of the bill in amendment of the election law, miscalled the force bill. If I am not mistaken, we sat up here all one night on that bill; at any rate, in other matters since I have been in the Senate we have remained in session all night and all the next day and the next night, and finally a vote was not reached. Why not?

I take my original supposition. Suppose that there are 30 Senators who feel that they are justified in using every parliamentary means to prevent the reaching of a vote on the bill which has been pending. Suppose we continue in session the whole 24 hours, 10 of those Senators, without making very long speeches, as speeches go on this bill, can occupy one 24 hours, 10 more of them can occupy another 24 hours, and 10 more another 24 hours, and then those who occupied the first 24 hours will be fresh and prepared again to deliver other speeches. In the meantime what will have become of the friends of the bill?

Mr. President, we have even made progress in filibustering. Relays of 10 are not required any more. Relays of 3, or at the best 4, are all that are necessary to prevent the ultimate consideration of any measure, and relays composed of that number can, of course, be multiplied by the number of Senators in the opposition.

To say the best, such a method of trying to reach a vote is harsh, and I might almost say inhuman. It requires that the friends of the bill shall keep a quorum of the Senate here constantly during continuous sessions. If at any moment there are present in the Chamber less than 43 Members of the Senate who favor the bill, that being a quorum, a quorum will be called and business will cease.

Mr. President, there are Senators in favor of this bill who can not, as a matter of physical ability, continue day after day and night after night in session here in order to get a vote. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. Morrill], who is on the Committee on Finance, has been called to his home by his inability to remain in this climate at this season; other Senators will be absent sick; and other Senators, by reason of age or by reason of feebleness, will be unable to continue in continuous session long enough to tire out the opposition.

I said such a practice was almost inhuman. It smacks of the methods of obtaining a verdict by a jury where the jury is locked up continuously until they give a verdict. The proposition is to force the minority to surrender upon a test of physical endurance. The result usually is that the majority surrenders upon the test of physical endurance.

I think, Mr. President, I may safely say that such is the outcome of nearly all such tests in the Senate, and the reason is obvious. The filibustering minority knows precisely what it is going to do. It can arrange and carry out a program. The majority must be constantly on the alert to answer roll calls and keep a quorum, and at same time take advantage of any possible opportunity or break which may offer for the purpose of securing a vote.

It is one of the principal condemnations of the system that a disciplined minority with a program deliberately arranged can conduct it without a break and present it in spite of the majority, which can not possibly pursue such a course, and which may be compared to a large body of undisciplined militia opposed by a smaller one of regular soldiers. It is therefore inevitable that where the contest becomes one of physical endurance, which always comes sooner or later, those who are conducting the filibuster must prevail.

On the same day the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who then was new to the Senate, as he says, and who had come fresh from the House, where he had witnessed the vigorous, systematic, and successful manner in which business was there conducted under the new rules, supported with much earnestness and with unanswerable logic the resolution of the Senator from Connecticut. I shall not read all the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts upon the subject upon that occasion, although they were, for the Senate, very brief. Although the Senator has changed his mind and is now a defender of this antiquated, illogical, and fossilized system of obstruction, he can not change the logic of his position nor avoid the reasons which he then gave for the faith that was in him. He said among other things:

The rules of the Senate have remained practically unchanged for a hundred years.

That is now urged by him and his associates as a conclusive reason why no change should be made. He takes refuge in the antiquity of an abuse, and because it is hoary with age it must not be disturbed.

Mr. President, I might digress to say that for more than a hundred years Members of the Senate were chosen by legislatures and not by the people. This was a constitutional requirement. Nevertheless an important reform has been made, and made successfully, in that direction. The argument of antiquity was for years a potent weapon of defense against that great reform, but the system went down, as it should have done, before the stern logic of the present demand, the necessities of modern conditions, and the supreme importance of restoring this body to its constitutional functions, and keeping it in touch with and responsible to its constituency.

The rules of the Senate have remained practically unchanged for a hundred years. Formed for a body of 26 Senators, they still continue to govern the deliberations of 88—

Now of 96—

They contain no method of compelling a vote. They are therefore rules which are based upon courtesy. By the courtesy of the Senate every Senator can speak at any length and at any time. There is, in a word, no method of preventing unlimited debate. But a system of courtesy in the conduct of business for a great legislative body, if it is to be anything or to have any effect, must be reciprocal. The unwritten law of mutual concession must be observed or a system of courtesy is impossible.

How true that is. The courtesy which is extended to the majority by this outrageous system of filibuster is a courtesy which keeps us here day after day and night after night. Broken rest and constantly diminished physical capacity are necessarily productive of dissension, of resentment, and of ill feeling. There is no courtesy about it, Mr. President. It is simply the use of brute force personified in the ability of those opposing needed legislation to obstruct through the exercise of their powers of physical endurance an ultimate determination of the business as they want it to be, although it holds up the entire business of the country without regard to its character.

Our calendar is burdened with four or five hundred measures, many of them of vast importance, but the business of the Senate is paralyzed. We can not reach it. We, the majority, are helpless. We are justly responsible for the affairs of government, yet our hands and feet are tied and our efforts stifled by a system that is defended on account of the fact that it has been in force for so many years.

The right of debate is not the only or the most important privilege to be considered.

There is another right more sacred in a legislative body than the right of debate, and that is the right to vote.

It was true in 1893; it was true before then; it is equally true now, Mr. President, because by our votes alone can we perform the functions of the body and carry out those measures which we at least deem to be essential to the public welfare.

It is assumed, it must be assumed, that if there is to be unlimited debate, by unwritten law there must equally be no obstruction to a vote.

It would interest me greatly to hear the Senator from Massachusetts refute himself upon that subject.

When it appears that unlimited debate, the right of which is accorded by courtesy, is used for the purposes of obstruction, then the system of courtesy has become impossible. When a minority not only does not allow a debate to come to a close, but will not even name any date, no matter how distant, at which it will assent to the close of that debate, it is obvious that courtesy has become entirely one sided; that unlimited debate is to be permitted, but that the right to vote is to be taken away. When the system of courtesy has reached this point it has not only ceased to be practicable, but it has become an abuse and a danger.

If it was an abuse and a danger in 1893, it is an abuse and a danger in 1915, and the later conversion of the Senator to the other side of the question in no manner affects the truth of his previous proposition.

Mr. President, I do not desire to be misunderstood. I do not lay the blame for obstruction upon the minority in this or any other case. It never rests with them. If the rules of any legislative body permit a minority to obstruct a measure the defense of which they deem of the least importance, they have the right under those rules to obstruct. The reason why there is filibustering or obstruction in any legislative body is because the majority does not prevent it. If there is delay, it is the fault of the majority, and of the majority alone, not of the minority.

Mr. President, I do not know that I can assent to that. It is true, as a general proposition, but I question its application to this body, because under the construction which has been given to our rules we are, and for years have been, bound hand and foot by them, so that the minority, using "the courtesy" of unlimited debate, may exercise that power not only against a particular measure, but can, and always do, invoke it against any attempt to so amend the rules as to modify the abuse.

The filibuster that is now going on, Mr. President, is not aimed at the shipping bill, but at an attempt of the majority to amend the rules, so that this Senate may do business; it has merely shifted the point of attack. We have changed the subject, but it has not altered the situation. Originally the majority by a surrender of its undoubted right to demand a vote may be responsible; but to hold it responsible for such a condition of affairs as confronts the country to-day can not, in my mind, be justified in view of our peculiar condition, which is the outgrowth of a misconstruction, if not an abuse, of the rules, as I regard it.

If a legislative body can not reach a vote, it is because the majority, responsible for the conduct of business, does not choose to have that vote reached. They ought to be able to reach it by rule. To substitute for a proper rule the test of physical endurance in a body like the Senate of the United States, seems to me, I must say, and I say it with all respect, to be pitiable. If the courtesy system has broken down, why can we not reach a vote in a dignified and proper way if it is to be done, as it must be done, by some form of compulsion? If the day has come when the courtesy of the Senate no longer exists, except for those who would speak and, by speaking, obstruct, then why is it not the more dignified and the better thing to pass a suitable rule to enable this body at some time, through its majority, to reach a vote?

A most pertinent inquiry, Mr. President, which the Democratic majority is now making, to which it wants to obtain an affirmative and a proper answer, an answer which will come, Mr. President, if I am any judge of public opinion, either by the mandate of public opinion operating directly upon the Senate or by a change of our system of procedure, which must be taken, and which I affirm will be taken, in order that the voice of the majority shall prevail, although by so doing we may be obliged to disregard, as we should disregard, some of the ancient precedents which have been set, to which we are so frequently referred as conclusive obstacles to change, however impervious the demand for it.

We govern in this country in our representative bodies by voting and debate. It is most desirable to have them both. Both are of great importance. But if we are to have only one, then the one that leads to action is the more important. To vote without debating may be hasty, may be ill considered, may be rash; but to debate and never vote is imbecility.

Another proposition, Mr. President, which is self-evident:

A legislative body which can not govern itself can not hold the respect of the people who have intrusted to it the duty of governing the country.

A legislative majority in any body which can not control the proceedings of that body becomes a subject of contempt both to itself and to the constituency which elected it. Yet such is our condition. For three weeks we have been endeavoring to get somewhere, and we have not even marked time, the Senator says.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. I rise for the purpose only of asking the Senator from Colorado if he will yield to me long enough to enable me to offer an amendment? I am compelled to leave the Chamber for a few moments.

Mr. THOMAS. I yield with the greatest pleasure.

Mr. CUMMINS. Inasmuch as the pending question is the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, to be added to the substitute proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa desire to have his amendment to the amendment now read?

Mr. GALLINGER. Let it be read.

Mr. CUMMINS. Let it be read, Mr. President. It is very short.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend the amendment of Mr. NORRIS by adding at the end thereof the following:

This rule shall not apply to any bill, motion, resolution, or question upon which Senators belonging to any political party have held a caucus and passed a resolution or declaration in any form attempting to bind the members of such party in the Senate to vote in any particular way, and where the application of the rule is moved by a Senator belonging to any such political party.

The fact respecting the existence of such caucus, resolution, or declaration shall be determined in the first instance by a committee of five Senators, appointed by the Presiding Officer, who shall report within two days and upon its report by the Senate without debate.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I rather anticipated that some reference to a caucus would be made before I finished, for we can not discuss the necessity of transacting business here and limiting debate to a reasonable area without the stale and chronic reference to the Democratic caucus. Mr. President, if it be true that the caucus is a justification of excuse for filibustering, then I concede that to be a very strong argument against it. It is the only one I have so far heard that is worth considering. Senators upon the other side of the Chamber criticize and denounce the caucus of the majority for the very good reason that if, by their denunciations or their criticisms they can compel an abandonment of its use, they perceive an opportunity for an entering wedge into our organization. They are concerned less about a caucus than they are for party success. The caucus may be objectionable, but the party which resorts to it has never yielded its views or its course of action to the mandate of a single Senator.

Mr. President, I do not propose to apologize for a caucus. Such caucuses as are held by the Democratic majority are useful; they are desirable; and with this unlimited power of filibuster they are absolutely essential. My own hope is, if we can not do it otherwise, that, through the exercise of the caucus power, we may determine upon some plan or method by means of which this infernal method of talking bills and Senates to death may be forever ended. If it can do this, it will have vindicated its right to live.

Mr. President, it is true, and no man denies it, that every public measure should be subject to full and to public discussion; to as much discussion as its importance demands. I do not believe that there is or can be any dispute upon that proposition, provided always that the discussion shall be bona fide and earnest and sincere. Minorities are thus made useful and formidable; their usefulness is in proportion to the earnestness of the opposition which they can make upon pending measures. But, Mr. President, discussion does not consist in a system of obstruction, miscalled debate, the purpose and object of which are to prevent any ultimate action whatever. I am in favor of real discussion, and I do not know of any man within the hearing of my voice who is not; but what sort of discussion, Mr. President, of this measure under the guise of debate has been inflicted upon the Senate and the country? This is not discussion—it is drivel.

I do not believe that many of our obstructing Senators would submit to the punishment involved in requiring them to read their own words pronounced in this Chamber. Ten, twelve, and fourteen hours each by one stalwart vocalist have been consumed, not in discussion, not in argument, but in vocal exercises full of sound and fury, but signifying nothing whatever; talks against time, involving competition between the actors, each of whom seems to be desirous of winning the belt for the longest period of physical endurance.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield to my friend, the Senator from New Hampshire, of course.

Mr. GALLINGER. I will ask the Senator from Colorado if he includes the very interesting speech that he delivered on this question when he openly announced that he was filibustering?

Mr. THOMAS. I think so, Mr. President. I should hate to inflict upon my very genial friend from New Hampshire even a request that he should read or review my remarks on that interesting occasion.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Colorado will use the same characterization as to the quality of that speech, I suppose, that he has applied to us on this side?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, Mr. President; perhaps the quality of my remarks was not so good as that of the remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. WEEKS. Does the Senator think it is reprehensible to filibuster?

Mr. THOMAS. I do, as a general proposition; yes, sir.

Mr. WEEKS. Does not the Senator admit that the majority in this Chamber filibustered the whole of the week before last, and that if a vote had been allowed any day of that week the shipping bill would have been defeated?

Mr. THOMAS. No, Mr. President, I do not admit that. On the contrary, I have been assured by some of the seven insurgent Democrats—who, I understand, made their agreement with the Republican minority, through and with the Senator from Massachusetts—that in the event of a recommitment of the bill they would have reported it right out again and that its consideration would then have continued. I say some of them have assured me so. I thought, and I still think, that a reference of the bill without instructions would have had the effect which the Senator states. I am not prepared, Mr. President, to make admissions for others, but I willingly make it for myself as to what I was attempting to do.

I did, Mr. President, for an hour or two talk against time. I did it because we were suddenly confronted with an unexpected and remarkable condition, sprung upon us without warning and which found us with three Democratic Senators absent from the Senate and without pairs. It was our duty to hold the fort for their return; but if my friend will join me and those who believe with me in the effort to place a limitation upon what is miscalled debate, then such things as are charged against me can not occur, or, if they do, they will be subject to whatever restrictions the rule itself may require.

Mr. President, I believe I was referring to caucuses a moment ago. Let me simply say that, for my part, that names do not appall me. I am unable to see any distinction between a caucus and a conference, either in the proceedings or in the outcome. I have noticed that, while our friends upon the other side never caucus, their conferences seem to result in a unity of action which should set this side a good example. If conferences can produce such unanimity of action, which caucuses apparently can not, then possibly we could make a change of nomenclature and accept the more desirable and less offensive term "conference"; but, to my mind, to attempt a distinction between them is like "straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel."

In line with my remarks, I read from the New York World of to-day:

THE DOOM OF AN ABUSE.

If caucus can kill filibuster, it will do the people a service. Few caucuses have taken more important action than that of the Senate Democrats on Saturday night, which decreed the end of that very vicious form of senatorial courtesy.

Senatorial courtesy had its origin in the theory that Senators were gentlemen and men of honor who did not need to be bound by hard-and-fast rules. The country is concerned just now with the abuse of the courtesy of debate. "Men of honor" talk for 15 hours, not to expound principles, but to consume time. "Gentlemen" who are great sticklers for courtesy mumble and drone all night, not to show gracious respect for their associates, but to wear them out and prevent them from doing what they have a right to do. In such circumstances filibustering becomes a conspiracy against majority rule.

We need not suppose that any Senator believes cloture can be carried during the present Congress. Unlimited debate has prevailed in the Senate for more than a century. It is the only legislative body on earth in which majorities are suppressed by minorities. What was at first a gentlemen's agreement has become by license an insuperable barrier to the popular will. An evil of such long standing can hardly be cured during the last days of a session, but as a party issue carried into the new Congress the decision of the caucus ought speedily to be made effective.

Mr. President, I sincerely trust that my associates will never abandon the caucus until its power can be utilized for the final overthrow of the greatest of all parliamentary abuses—the power of an obstructive minority by unlimited talk, miscalled discussion, to destroy the majority, render it powerless, and substitute itself for the lawful government of the country.

Mr. President, I am willing to concede in part that obstructive tactics in the Senate have been the result of what is called "courtesy," but I am not sure that that is the only basis for them. I have noticed that obstruction, or the threat of it, can be used to put legislation through here which but for its use or the threat of it might have been defeated, and which but for its use perhaps should be defeated. No legislation should find a place upon the statute books which is placed there through the threat of unlimited debate before an unwilling and reluctant audience.

I recall, Mr. President, shortly after I came to the Senate, one night when the public-buildings bill was before the Senate, that a Senator offered an amendment providing for an appropriation of $45,000 for the improvement of certain public buildings in one of the great cities of the country. A point of order was about to be made against it, which would have been sustained, whereupon the Senator, having a vast bundle of manuscript and papers with him, took the floor and said, "Very well; if the point is to be made against it, I have some general remarks to make against the whole bill." He did not say so, but every appearance was that he proposed to talk all night. In order to prevent that infliction upon the Senate, in order to save time, which was then very valuable because the session was drawing to a close, the point of order was withdrawn and the Senator permitted to incorporate his amendment in the bill for an appropriation of $45,000. It may have been perfectly proper; the amendment may have been a needed one; the amount of money covered by it may have been essential for the purpose mentioned; but the fact remains that it became a part of that bill because of the power of a single Senator to hold this body as long as he was physically able to work his jaw. And I dare affirm that this was but one of many similar instances. An appropriation which depends upon the threat of a filibuster for its enactment stands under the shadow of suspicion and furnishes an additional and a potent argument against the system.

Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I have not undergone a change of mind upon the necessity of a reasonable limitation upon debate. Senators upon both sides who have been here many years have said to me several times, "You are a new man here, and all new men want cloture; but after they have been here a little while and find how smoothly the old machinery works and how desirable it is at times and how difficult it is to change it, they are gradually transformed from advocates of a cloture to the champions and defenders of the filibuster." I was forcibly reminded of that, Mr. President, when on Saturday the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], interrupting the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], declared that he had been convinced that his original conception of the filibuster was wrong by listening to a speech by a Democratic Senator upon the other side of the subject. The only pleasure derived from that statement was that a Democratic Senator could convince my genial friend from New Hampshire of anything.

Now, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has also called attention to his conversion, which occurred, I think, 10 years after his speech. It may be that if I am spared long enough to see the "real insides" of this method of procedure, after I shall have learned it by heart, after long years of experience I, too, may see the rare advantage of it; but my earnest prayer is that long before that time comes there will be a radical change in our method of procedure.

When we provided for the election of Senators by the people we only took but one step, Mr. President, toward popularizing this body. That step will prove worthless so long as our present antiquated system of rules enables the same influences which brought this body into disrepute to impede the progress of legislation and defeat the will of the majority. Let us take that step, Democrats, and let us take it as soon as we can, to the end that the Senate of the United States may again become in very truth a representative body, a body responding to the needs and necessities of the great constituencies for whom its Members speak; a body for the promotion, and not for the prevention, of needed legislation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the——

Mr. REED and Mr. ROOT addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Fall	Nelson	Smith, Ga.
Bankhead	Fletcher	O'Gorman	Smith, Md.
Brady	Gallinger	Oliver	Smith, Mich.
Brandegee	Goff	Overman	Smoot
Bristow	Hardwick	Owen	Stephenson
Bryan	Hollis	Page	Sterling
Burleigh	Hughes	Perkins	Stone
Burton	James	Pittman	Sutherland
Camden	Johnson	Poindexter	Swanson
Catron	Kern	Ransdell	Thomas
Chilton	Lane	Reed	Thompson
Clark, Wyo.	Lea, Tenn	Robinson	Townsend
Clarke, Ark.	Lee, Md.	Root	Vardaman
Colt	Lewis	Saulsbury	Warren
Crawford	Lippitt	Shafroth	Weeks
Culberson	Lodge	Sheppard	White
Cummins	McCumber	Shively	Works
Dillingham	Martin, Va.	Simmons
du Pont	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ariz.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I desire to state that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], and the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] are absent from the Senate on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York.

Mr. ROOT. I wish to make some observations bearing upon the subject which is now before the Senate.

The unfinished business which is now before us is the resolution offered by the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to amend Rule XXII of the standing rules of the Senate by providing that a vote shall be taken upon a bill now on the calendar of the Senate, and which we call the ship-purchase bill, by providing that that vote shall be taken at a specified hour on the 19th day of the present month.

There are certain amendments pending to that resolution. I suppose the merits of the whole resolution are relevant to the discussion of the amendments, and I suppose also that the question whether the resolution of the Senator from Missouri ought to be adopted must depend upon two different considerations: One, the consideration of the question whether the method of transacting the business of the Senate ought to be interfered with by fixing a time to vote on a particular bill by resolution; the other, the consideration of the question whether, if under any circumstances the general business of the Senate ought to be interfered with by fixing a time to vote by resolution, such a resolution ought to be employed with reference to this particular bill.

I undertake to say that there should be a negative answer upon each of those questions. I shall address myself to the first; that is, the question whether the business of the Senate as it has been conducted for a century ought to be interfered with by a resolution of this description. Let me first say a word about the proposition which was made in this Chamber on Saturday of last week by the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES]. He said, in substance, that if he were in the Chair and a motion for the previous question were made he would put the question to the Senate.

Now, sir, I wish to say about that that it would be a plain, unequivocal violation of the express rule of the Senate. Rule XXII of the Senate provides:

When a question is pending, no motion shall be received but—
To adjourn.
To adjourn to a day certain, or that when the Senate adjourn it shall be to a day certain.
To take a recess.
To proceed to the consideration of executive business.
To lay on the table.
To postpone indefinitely.
To postpone to a day certain.
To commit.
To amend.
Which several motions shall have precedence as they stand arranged; and the motions relating to adjournment, to take a recess, to proceed to the consideration of executive business, to lay on the table shall be decided without debate.

Mr. President, it is plain—it must be plain to anyone in the possession of his faculties and ordinary composure—that the previous question can not be moved except upon the matter which is before the Senate. No one can move that a question now be put unless it is a question upon the matter before the Senate; and when any matter is before the Senate, when any question is pending, the rule says no motion shall be received but the motions which are enumerated. The rule says, in necessary effect, that no motion that the previous question be put shall be received.

The perfectly plain reading of the rule, which it is impossible to mistake, is enforced by the fact that the original rule of the Senate provided for the previous question, and that down to the year 1806 this rule relating to the motions which shall be received while a question is pending enumerated the previous question as one of the motions that could be put equally with the motion to adjourn, to take a recess, to lay on the table, to postpone, to commit, to amend, and the others that are enumerated. I say that in the rule of the Senate which existed down to 1806, and which enumerated the motions that should be received when a question was pending, the previous question was included. In that year—the year 1806—a committee of the Senate, of which John Quincy Adams was a member, was appointed to revise the rules; and they brought in, and the Senate adopted, a revision which excluded the previous question from the motions which could be received when any question was pending.

Prior to 1806 the rule of the Senate said that when a question is pending no motion shall be received except the previous question, the motion to adjourn, to postpone, and so forth. After 1806 the rule of the Senate said that when a question is pending no motion shall be received except a motion to adjourn, to postpone, and so forth, enumerating the list, which excludes the previous question.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. ROOT. One moment. For 108 years the Senate of the United States has so understood the rule, has so practiced and applied the rule, and in all the great controversies that have occurred in this Chamber, excited as were the feelings, great as were the interests involved, determined as was the opposition, determined as has been the majority to enforce its will, never has there been any question but that the rule as it is written here and as it has stood during all the century excluded the previous question from the motions that can be entertained while a question is pending.

I now yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I merely wanted to ask the Senator if it is not a fact that between 1789 and 1806 the Senate, because of its small number and the small business, had found no use for the previous question, and if it is not a fact that it was only used three times in 17 years?

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, that is in accordance with my understanding of the facts; and it was because the Senate of that day considered that the previous question was not a useful motion that they put the rule into the present form, which excludes the previous question. I am not now, sir, arguing whether there ought to be or ought not to be a previous question. I am merely undertaking to demonstrate that if the Senator from Kentucky had done as he said he would do he would have violated the express rules of the Senate as they have stood for a century. What I am trying to do is to leave no doubt in the Senate that what the Senator from Kentucky said he would do if he went into the Chair would be revolution.

Mr. President, I use the term advisedly. If the Senate of the United States does not proceed in accordance with its rules, then there is no deliberative body to consider and make the laws. You may consider a rule inexpedient and unwise; if so, you can change it; but so long as rules stand there is no protection for liberty, there is no protection for representative government, unless they are obeyed. You can not draw the line between a Senate of the United States that violates its rules of procedure, between a Senate that permits its presiding officer to violate the express rules of its procedure, and any ward meeting of a political party or faction. You have either one or the other, and if you cut loose from one you go to the other. Mr. President, you can not limit your damage. [A pause.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York may proceed.

Mr. ROOT. I am under obligations to the Chair for this kindly though somewhat belated recognition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will say for the Chair that the admonition on the part of the Senator from New York was not necessary. The Chair felt that his ears were quite copious enough to take in the remarks of the Senator from New York while a little side remark was going on. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROOT. The Senator from New York is far from disputing the Chair's estimate as to the capacity of the Chair's ears, but the division of attention is necessarily a check to the free flow of thought on the part of the speaker.

I was observing that you can not limit the injury which is done by a failure to observe the rules of procedure. If a rule is broken after debate has continued for a month it can be broken when debate has continued for a week, or for an hour, or when it has not begun. If the Chair, in violation of the express rules of the Senate, can put the previous question, when the rule says it shall not be put, after long debate, the Chair can put the previous question when there has been no debate. If the Chair can refuse to recognize a Senator of the United States when he rises in his place to debate, to be heard upon a matter pending before the Senate, after there has been long debate, the Chair can refuse recognition when there has been no debate. You can not have your rules and ignore them. You can not break them to-day and have their protection to-morrow.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. ROOT. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. Would the Senator object to the adoption of a rule providing for the previous question after there had been, in the minds of all reasonable men, reasonable debate of a bill which was pending before the Senate?

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I do not wish to be drawn aside from the specific question to which I am addressing myself by a discussion as to what changes of the rules may be expedient. I am talking now about the observance of the rules as they are, whatever they are.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator another question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York further yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. POMERENE. Does the Senator think that the rules of the Senate, if given a reasonable interpretation by reasonable men, recognize unlimited debate to the extent that Senators shall talk 10, 12, and 13 hours—one after another—continuously, when their manifest purpose is to defeat a vote upon the bill, and it has been so declared on the floor of the Senate?

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I think the rules of the Senate prohibit the putting of the previous question. I think the rules of the Senate require the Chair to recognize every Senator who seeks recognition to debate a question. I think the rules of the Senate preclude the prevention of any Senator of the United States being heard upon a question pending before the Senate, and what I am endeavoring to impress upon the Senate is that if you refuse to abide by and keep inviolate the rules of the Senate the whole system of a deliberative body is destroyed and you are no better off than you would be in a ward meeting of a political faction.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. OWEN. I wish to ask the Senator from New York if in his opinion unlimited debate is within the rule, whether the Senate could ever pass upon the question of a previous question, if it were before the Senate, if the Senator from New York and his colleagues objected?

Mr. ROOT. Oh, Mr. President, the previous question is a well-known parliamentary method of ending debate; and when a motion for the previous question is received and put there can be then no debate, and if it is carried there can be then no debate; but as the previous question is expressly excluded by the rules of the Senate there is no question left about it but the question whether we will violate the rules of the Senate.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York further yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. OWEN. May I ask the Senator whether he is unwilling to answer my question?

Mr. ROOT. I have answered it, if I understood it. If not, will the Senator repeat it?

Mr. OWEN. What I did ask the Senator was whether we can ever change these rules under his interpretation of this rule?

Mr. ROOT. I think they can be changed, Mr. President; yes.

Mr. OWEN. I should like to know how.

Mr. ROOT. It is not my purpose to instruct the Senator. [Laughter.] I fear that he would make a use of the instruction which would be disagreeable to me.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator decline to yield further?

Mr. ROOT. I think I will go on.

Mr. OWEN. I do not wish the Senator to yield further. He has made a sufficient answer for my purpose. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROOT. I am very glad to have gratified the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York has the floor.

Mr. ROOT. I say what I have said because of the declaration of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] as to what he would do, and because there have been floating about the Senate rumors, to which I have given no credence, that it was the purpose of this and that and the other Senator taking the chair to refuse to recognize Senators when they rose to speak upon the pending question.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. JAMES. If I understand the Senator from New York, his position is that for a Presiding Officer to recognize a Senator to move the previous question, which motion was submitted to the Senate upon a roll call, would be an act of revolution, but that a few Senators upon that side, two or three, who openly, boldly, and defiantly say that you will not permit a majority of the Senate to express its will are highly patriotic.

Mr. ROOT. No, Mr. President; I say nothing of the kind. I say that, in the first place, the will of a majority is always certain to control, and there never has been a case where it did not. I say, in the next place, that the one situation which the Senator from Kentucky proposes is a violation of an express rule of the Senate, and the other is something which does not exist. No one that I know of has declared that he would not permit the majority to have its will. I have heard Senators say, and I have said myself, that so far as I can prevent it by proper parliamentary procedure the majority should not force this particular measure to a vote until it had been so discussed that the people of the United States have had an opportunity to know what was going on and to form and express their opinions about it. If that be treason——

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, does the Senator from New York know of any specific rule of the Senate that denies to this body the right to have the previous question ordered?

Mr. ROOT. I do. Perhaps the Senator from Kentucky was not here when I referred to it.

Mr. JAMES. I was not.

Mr. ROOT. I have read to the Senate Rule XXII, which prohibits in express terms the receiving of such a motion.

Mr. JAMES. But, if the Senator will permit me, the Senate, at last, is the final power of decision upon all questions, and if the Presiding Officer should refuse to recognize a Senator to move the previous question, might he not appeal from that decision and let the Senate itself decide whether or not the appeal was well taken, and if the Senate did decide that the appeal should be sustained, would it not be the duty of the Presiding Officer then to put the previous question to the Senate; and, at last, would it not be just the same as an original ruling submitting the question to the Senate, because the Senate would decide for itself? I know of no ruling that you might properly call a revolution which submits to the determination of the majority the decision of any question.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky has merely proposed an ingenious method of violating the rules of the Senate. The rule is that when a question is pending no motion shall be received but the enumerated motions. Under that rule it is the duty of the Chair to refuse to receive the motion. Under the rules of the Senate its rules can be changed only in a specific way and in no other way. There has to be a particular notice given, and the notice has to be for a given time until another meeting of the Senate, and the change of the rule is debatable. It must be deliberate and upon consideration, and the rule expressly prevents the ingenious sidestepping which the Senator from Kentucky suggests.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from New York that I have quite frequently seen questions of that sort submitted to the Senate and I have heard quite often our distinguished Vice President say the Senate, at last, is the arbiter of its own fate; it, at last, must decide for itself what rules it desires. Now, the Senator says those rules exist for the minority, they do not exist for the Senate. Have they been adopted by the Senate?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly; we always adopt them at the beginning of a Congress.

Mr. JAMES. I am asking the Senator from New York. If the Senator from New Hampshire wants to answer that, let him do so. Does the Senator say they have been adopted?

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, the Senate is a continuous body.

Mr. JAMES. I know; and that is the ingenious way you gentlemen——

Mr. GALLINGER. That is the fact.

Mr. JAMES (continuing). Have to tie the hands of the representatives of the American people.

Mr. ROOT. This is a new proposal.

Mr. JAMES. These rules have not been adopted by the Senate. There are merely the inheritance of a hundred years behind us, with the gathered cobwebs and dust that have come down through the centuries. It is to say that it must be done by some new change and that we can not ourselves submit to the majority the right to transact business.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I infer from the last remarks of the Senator from Kentucky that his naturally incisive mind has penetrated to the substantial basis which I have been presenting to show that such a thing as he proposes can not be done in accordance with the rules of the Senate, and he now makes the proposition that the Senate has no rules. That is rather a startling proposition. The Senate is a continuous body, and its rules once adopted continue until they are changed. Does anybody dispute that?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. ROOT. Does anybody dispute that the Senate is a continuing body?

Mr. THOMAS. I dispute it; and that will be tested out at the beginning of the next Congress. The Senate is a continuous body, in the sense that two-thirds of it hold over with every Congress. We appoint our new committees and assign the new Members; but there is no more reason why the rules of the Senate should continue from Congress to Congress than that our committees should continue from Congress to Congress. I do not know what others may think about it, but one of the efforts I shall make will be to secure a change of the rules and test that question when the new Senate shall organize.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, that will be very interesting.

Mr. THOMAS. I hope it will also be successful.

Mr. ROOT. I shall, from my distant home, follow the public press with great interest to see what results flow from the Herculean efforts of the Senator from Colorado to change the rules of the century; but it has not a very important bearing upon the question now before us.

Mr. THOMAS. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. ROOT. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not pretend to be able to make any Herculean efforts or to exercise the same power and ability as the Senator from New York. I am merely stating an opinion which is drawn from the Senator's inquiry and which I thought should be answered. I do not know whether we shall succeed or not, but the fact that the Senate is under rules of construction which have tied its hands and feet for a hundred years has no terrors for me. I believe the rules are made for the Senate. I do not think the Senate was made for the rules.

Mr. ROOT. May I ask the Senator from Colorado, if I can do so without losing the floor, whether he thinks we have any rules?

Mr. THOMAS. Oh, Mr. President, I think we have rules, but I have been unable to find any rule——

Mr. ROOT. May I ask a further question? Whether the Senator from Colorado thinks that we can deny the existence of rules that do not suit us and assert the existence of rules that do?

Mr. THOMAS. I do nothing of the kind.

Mr. ROOT. Does the Senator from Colorado then agree with the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. THOMAS. I do. If I understand the position of the Senator from Kentucky, it is——

Mr. ROOT. May I ask if that agreement was brought about by a caucus resolution, because the Senator from Kentucky says there are no rules and the Senator from Colorado says there are? I can see no agreement in that unless it is the result of a resolution.

Mr. THOMAS. It is evident the only answer that can be made when a Senator can make no other is to refer to the caucus and ask some question about the caucus. I had not completed my answer to the Senator's first question. If I understand the position of the Senator from Kentucky, it is that the rules nowhere justify the conclusion that the previous question does not exist, and that unless there is some express prohibition of it it can be invoked.

Mr. JAMES. Under parliamentary law.

Mr. THOMAS. In view of the fact that Jefferson's Manual, now a part of the rules, which treats of the previous question, was discussed, I am able to agree with the Senator from Kentucky upon that proposition. I may be wrong. If I am, I hope to be corrected by the Senator from New York.

Mr. ROOT. The last proposition of the Senator from Kentucky was that the Senate has no rules.

Mr. THOMAS. I am not responsible for that.

Mr. JAMES. What I stated, if the Senator will allow me——

Mr. THOMAS. I am taking the position of the Senator from Kentucky as he stated it on Saturday evening. I gather his position from what he then said.

Mr. ROOT. The Senator from Colorado was quite correct. The position taken by the Senator from Kentucky last Saturday was that he would break the rules into little bits. His position now is that there are no rules to break.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator can not place that construction on the remarks of the Senator from Kentucky, but he is able to answer for himself. His position was—at least as I understood it, as it addressed itself to my intelligence at the time—as I stated a few moments ago.

Mr. JAMES. Will the Senator from New York permit me?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly.

Mr. JAMES. My position was that the Senate now serving in the Sixty-third Congress had not adopted these rules. Of course, I understand the Senator's position is that we are acting under the rules formulated back yonder a hundred years ago. If I understand the position of the Senator from New York, that the Senate is a continuous body, why is it that we have every two years to reintroduce bills? They ought not to die if the Senate is a continuous body.

Mr. ROOT. Because the Congress comes to an end, Mr. President.

Mr. JAMES. Yes; the Congress comes to an end, but the Senate does not, and if the Senate is a continuous body, I know this, that every bill ought to continue alive, just like these rules do. If the Senator from New York will permit me, I should like to ask him this question. If I state his proposition aright—and he is very able to do that himself—it is this: We had 13 States in the Union, and therefore 26 Senators; 130 years ago they met and formulated certain parliamentary rules to govern their deliberations, among which was unlimited debate. That right of unlimited debate was given in the Senate. Being a continuous body, it has existed from year to year until we find ourselves, 130 years removed from that time, with our hands still tied and with a minority of Senators given the right to talk and talk and to deny to the Senate the right to transact public business.

Is it possible, I ask the Senator, that we, here in this progressive age, a great Republic of 100,000,000 people, have our hands still tied by the action of 13 States, by 26 Senators, when back yonder they did not have the one-thousandth part of the public business to transact that we have at this time, and that by reason of that action we can not transact public business because a minority, I may say, of two men—anyhow, three men—can as effectively prevent the transaction of business in this body as a majority of men can?

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. GALLINGER. May I ask the Senator from New York a question?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. I have here the Constitution of the United States, made over a hundred years ago, and every one who subscribed to it is dead. Yet it is the law of the land, and it has not been acted upon since as a whole and confirmed in any way.

Mr. JAMES. I think there is some difference, if the Senator from New York will permit me, between the Constitution and the rules of the Senate; at least I hope there is.

Mr. THOMAS. The rules seem to be superior here.

Mr. JAMES. The Constitution points out the way by which it can be amended.

Mr. GALLINGER. So do our rules.

Mr. JAMES. But I understand the Senator from New York is driven, in order to sustain his position, to the ground that the Senate by a minority of two or three men are given a right, that it was given by the Senate 130 years ago and we can not get away from at all, as long as physical endurance will allow those men to talk and keep the majority from a vote.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator from New York will permit me further, I call attention to the fact that there is a rule governing this body in the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. JAMES. Oh, certainly; that we shall vote, but we do not seem to do it.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, if I may get back to the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York has the floor.

Mr. ROOT. The Senator from Kentucky has incorrectly stated through inadvertence the fact that the 13 States which formed our Union did not adopt in the Senate unlimited debate. They established a rule for the previous question, and that continued until 1806.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, 11 States adopted the rules of the Senate. I do not think that either North Carolina or Rhode Island was then represented here.

Mr. ROOT. The original 11 States adopted then, not unlimited debate, but a rule for a previous question. In 1806 the Senate came to the conclusion that the previous question was not useful, and coming to the conclusion that there should be no limit upon debate, changed the rule and made the rule as it now stands, prohibiting the Chair from receiving any motion for the previous question.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky asks, "Shall we be bound by these old dead hands?" Yes; unless we see fit to change the rule. Nor is it the dead hand alone that binds us; it is the observance and recognition of the rule at every session of the Senate for these 108 years. Time and again in this body you, Mr. President, have declared Senators in order or out of order, their motions and their steps in parliamentary procedure permissible or forbidden with reference to these rules, and to the precedents which in the construction of them have been built up year by year in every session of the Senate during all the century. Bound by the men of a hundred years ago? No; bound by all the great and patriotic and wise and able men who have made the Senate of the United States for that century, bound by the rulings of every Vice President and every President pro tempore of the Senate during that century.

The Senate not a continuing body! Why, sir, what happened here two years ago come the 4th of March, when the hammer had fallen that marked the death of the Sixty-second Congress? It was here in the Senate of the United States you were inducted into office. What will happen when this session is adjourned on the 4th of March? The Senate, not the House, is called together to pass upon the nominations which the President may see fit to make. What happens with our joint committees? These grounds about us, this great library with its store of learning, the Botanic Garden, are under the control and direction of the Joint Committee on the Library. What happens when Congress adjourns? The House goes out of existence; there is a new House, and until that House is organized the statute says the Senate committee is the Joint Committee of Congress on the Library. No reorganization is required; no new appointment of committees is required; but ipso facto the instant the gavel falls upon the Sixty-third Congress the Joint Committee of Congress upon the Library, with all its powers, will be composed solely of the Senate committee, with Mr. LEA of Tennessee at its head.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President——

Mr. ROOT. You can not break in with a new idea of that kind upon the agreement of minds for a century, as if it were a matter of first impression.

Mr. JAMES. Suppose the term of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. LEA] expired, and the Vice President's term expired?

Mr. ROOT. The Senate committee still continues.

Mr. JAMES. That is made so by a special law, though, is it not?

Mr. ROOT. It is by a law which recognizes the continuance of the Senate and of its committees.

Mr. JAMES. I understand that; but it is by a law that has passed both Houses of Congress, and which has been signed by the President?

Mr. ROOT. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. ROOT. I do.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. The Senator from Kentucky—I will ask a question, but I have first to make the statement briefly—the Senator from Kentucky, if I understood him correctly, stated that, although the rule prohibited the Chair from receiving a motion for the previous question, if the Chair should submit the question to the Senate and should be sustained by a majority of the Senate in receiving it, then that procedure would cease to be revolutionary and would become justifiable. In the opinion of the Senator from New York, would the breach of that rule be any less revolutionary if it were approved by the entire majority of the Senate?

Mr. ROOT. No, Mr. President; it would not be in the slightest degree cured, because the purpose of rules is to establish a course of conduct which shall be a protection to the minority and preserve them in the performance of their duties against arbitrary repression on the part of the majority.

There is an old phrase that I remember from my student days, when the good Queen Victoria was upon the throne of England, and men spoke in the House of Commons of Her Majesty's opposition—not merely Her Majesty's Government, but Her Majesty's opposition—and rightly so, for the functions of the minority are as important to the preservation of representative government as are the functions of the majority. It is the duty of the minority to insist upon discussion, consideration, publicity, openness, to bring out and keep in the full sunlight of public knowledge the conduct of public business; and, sir, there is no right of liberty in a Republic more essential and vital than is the preservation and the protection of the minority in the performance of their duty.

Otherwise, sir, why are we here at all? Why should not all of the members of the minority go to their homes? Why are we here through long days and nights inhaling poison, enfeebling our powers, shortening our lives? Why should not the resolution of the caucus—my friend from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] will forgive me if I refer again to that subject, which seems to cause him so much discomfort—why should not the resolution of the caucus have been brought into this Chamber and registered the day it was passed? Why have a vote? Why have any discussion if the rights of the majority are all that are to be considered; if the verdict of the majority must without let or hindrance, without postponement or discussion, except as a privilege, be registered as law? I say, sir, that unless the minority has rights which are to be protected, unless the minority is performing a public duty, why should not the edict of the caucus have been brought into this Chamber and registered as law?

But, sir, if you do that there is an end of representative government; if you do that, there is no occasion for the majority. If they destroy the functions of the minority, they equally destroy the functions of the majority, for they can not perform the duties of representative government by holding a secret conclave and coming to an agreement with an Executive. That is not the function of a majority.

Mr. President, the views that have been expressed here, the views that are entertained here by the majority, under the pressure of their excited feelings in this controversy, go to the length of destroying representative government and substituting for it a government which does not differ in any degree whatever from the government of Rome under the Emperors, of France under the later Bourbons, of Mexico under Diaz. It is a serious matter, sir; it is of more importance than shipping bills. They raise the question whether our Government is to be permitted to function or whether they will paralyze this body; whether they will cut out its essential machinery and substitute results that are obtained without its action by an entirely extra-constitutional proceeding.

Sir, the only protection for this system of government by representation is to be found in these rules. If you break the rules or ignore the rules and undertake to go on without them, then you cast aside the only protection for the real performance of the duties of a representative body against the arbitrary will of a majority, which is reached by agreement made outside of the Chamber.

Mr. President, I have said all that I wish to say upon this particular subject. I had in mind going on with something further, changing the topic somewhat; but I will take occasion to do that at a later time if the rules of the Senate are not destroyed, so that it will be impossible.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question before he takes his seat.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator from New York a question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. REED. I yield for a question.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. A great deal has been said on the other side about a majority. In the opinion of the Senator from New York, does it make any difference whether a majority of the States have at no time recorded their votes in favor of this measure? We have had a number of roll calls, but upon no single roll call has there been revealed a majority of the States of the Union in favor of the proposition advocated by the other side.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I had supposed that this forum was the place where the States were peculiarly represented.

Mr. REED. I yield to the Senator from Michigan to ask a question.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am through. The Senator from Missouri need not worry about my extending my remarks.

Mr. REED. I do not intend that you shall.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I had supposed that the States here had a special right; that this was peculiarly the forum of the States; and yet there has not been a majority of the States voting on a single roll call in favor of this administration measure.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I had intended, if I had gone on with my remarks, to make some observations upon a subject very close to that which has been mentioned by the Senator from Michigan—not the precise proposition which he has made, but very close to it, and having a direct relation to the attitude of the representatives of the States in this body to the rules and to the practices which are creeping in and which are exhibited in the dealing with this subject; but, sir, I will defer to another time my remarks on that subject.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I move to lay the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] on the table, and upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Gallinger	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ariz.
Bankhead	Goff	Nelson	Smith, Ga.
Brady	Gore	Norris	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	Gronna	O'Gorman	Smoot
Bristow	Hardwick	Oliver	Stephenson
Bryan	Hitchcock	Overman	Sterling
Burleigh	Hollis	Owen	Stone
Camden	Hughes	Page	Sutherland
Catron	James	Penrose	Swanson
Chilton	Johnson	Perkins	Thomas
Clapp	Kenyon	Poindexter	Thompson
Clark, Wyo.	Kern	Pomerene	Tillman
Clarke, Ark.	La Follette	Ransdell	Townsend
Colt	Lane	Reed	Vardaman
Crawford	Lea, Tenn.	Robinson	Walsh
Culberson	Lee, Md.	Saulsbury	Warren
Cummins	Lewis	Shafroth	Weeks
Dillingham	Lippitt	Sheppard	White
du Pont	Lodge	Shields	Williams
Fall	McCumber	Shively	Works
Fletcher	Martin, Va.	Simmons

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. What is the question before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri has moved to lay the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] upon the table.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I ask that the amendment be stated.

Mr. TOWNSEND. May we have that amendment read, so that we may know what it is?

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. STONE. Pending that I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 15 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had canceled his signature to the enrolled bill (S. 7555) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Suwanee River, in the State of Florida.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair announces the cancellation of the signature of the Vice President to the enrolled bill just received from the House of Representatives.

RECESS.

Mr. STONE. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m., Monday, February 15, 1915) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 16, 1915, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 15, 1915.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We thank Thee, our Father in Heaven, that amid all the changing scenes of life Thou art permanent. We are the moving procession. Thou art the same yesterday, to-day, and forever. We may pause, even retrograde, but Thy love stands waiting with beckoning hand to lure us onward and upward to permanency of character in righteousness, truth, justice, mercy, purity; for Thou art God—

"That God, which ever lives and loves;
One God, one law, one element,
And one far-off divine event,
To which the whole creation moves."

So may we trust and advance under the leadership of the Master. Amen.

The Journals of the proceedings of Saturday, February 13, 1915, and Sunday, February 14, 1915, were read and approved.

BRIDGE ACROSS SUWANEE RIVER.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the RECORD of Saturday in both the Senate and the House proceedings shows that Senate bill 7555, an act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Suwanee River in the State of Florida, was signed by the Speaker and the Vice President as an enrolled bill. The Senate bill, with a similar House bill, was reported on Saturday. I do not think that the Journal shows that it passed the House. If it passed the House at any time, it has not been shown by the proceedings here.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, the fact is, if the gentleman will permit, the House bill was reported by the committee on Friday, and after the committee had adjourned the Senate bill came over to the committee too late to report it out at that meeting. So the fact is that the House bill stands on the calendar reported by the committee, and the Senate bill has been referred to the committee and has been unacted upon.

Mr. MANN. But the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shows, on page 3762 in the House proceedings, that the bill had been signed by the Speaker as an enrolled bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. That ought to be corrected.

Mr. MANN. The RECORD also shows in the Senate proceedings on page 3696 that the bill was messaged from the House to the Senate as having been signed by the Speaker and that it was thereupon signed by the Vice President.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have no doubt that was some other bill, and that a mistake of identity has been made.

Mr. MANN. But in each case the title of the bill is given correctly.

Mr. ADAMSON. It is not the fact.

Mr. MANN. That is the reason I am calling attention to it. If, as a matter of fact, it was sent over by inadvertence——

The SPEAKER. It was.

Mr. MANN. It ought to be recalled.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman make a motion to that effect?

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate be requested to return the bill to the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the Senate be notified of the situation and that they be requested to return the bill to the House. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. ADAMSON. That bill did not get reported in time to be put upon the Calendar for Unanimous Consent, but I hope that we will be permitted to pass it to-day notwithstanding.

CALENDAR FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT.

The SPEAKER. The business in order to-day is the Calendar for Unanimous Consent, and the Chair repeats a request he made about this calendar on several occasions. If a gentleman has made up his mind resolutely to object to a bill, the Chair requests that he make his objection immediately after the reading of the title. The Clerk will call the first bill on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

BRIDGE ACROSS ST. LOUIS RIVER, BETWEEN WISCONSIN AND MINNESOTA.

The first business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill H. R. 17762, to amend an act approved February 20, 1908, entitled "An act to authorize the Interstate Transfer Railway Co. to construct a bridge across the St. Louis River between the States of Wisconsin and Minnesota."

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been read at a previous time, and I think it is not necessary to read it again. I ask unanimous consent that present consideration be given to H. R. 17762, the bill just reported, and also to H. R. 15727, authorizing the county of St. Louis to construct a bridge across the St. Louis River between Minnesota and Wisconsin, and also S. 5325, authorizing the county of St. Louis to construct a bridge across the St. Louis River between Minnesota and Wisconsin. I ask unanimous consent that all three of these bills be considered at this time.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, that is exactly what would happen in the calling of the Calendar in the regular way.

Mr. MILLER. I want to know now whether unanimous consent is to be given to the consideration of each one of the three.

Mr. BORLAND. How could the gentleman know that?

Mr. MILLER. We certainly can know it if the House agrees to it at this time.

Mr. BORLAND. Are these three all for the same bridge?

Mr. MILLER. No; two are for the same bridge and one is not.

Mr. BORLAND. What is the connection between them?

Mr. MILLER. I think there is no connection whatever between them. There are other gentlemen who think that there is a connection, and I therefore make this request in respect to them all.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, while it has not appeared to the committee that there was any necessary or proper conflict between the two propositions, yet the alignment has been such that there are gentlemen on each side who do not want consent to be given for one to pass until they know the other will pass.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that all three of the bills referred to be considered.

Mr. ADAMSON. They are all upon the same subject.

Mr. LENROOT. I object. Let us take them up in their order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] objects. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill H. R. 17762, which the Clerk has reported?

Mr. MILLER. I object. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] objects to the consideration of his own bill, and I object to this.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill on the Calendar.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 2789. An act to award the medal of honor to Maj. John O. Skinner, surgeon, United States Army, retired.

The message also announced that the Senate had disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to bills of the following titles, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SHIVELY, Mr. JOHNSON, and Mr. SHERMAN as the conferees on the part of the Senate:

S. 6980. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors;

S. 7213. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors; and

S. 7402. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 2789. An act to award the medal of honor to Maj. John O. Skinner, surgeon, United States Army, retired—to the Committee on Military Affairs.

BRIDGE ACROSS ST. LOUIS RIVER.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 15727) authorizing the county of St. Louis to construct a bridge across the St. Louis River between Minnesota and Wisconsin.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects, and both of these bills are stricken from the calendar.

Mr. ADAMSON. I want to observe, while the gentlemen seem to be even, this is not getting us anywhere.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER. There is nothing before the House.

Mr. MILLER. We can object to a great many of these bills.

CONSTRUCTION OF TWO REVENUE CUTTERS.

The business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 18876) to provide for the construction of two revenue cutters.

The title was read.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and the bill is ordered stricken from the calendar.

TO AMEND THE ACT TO REGULATE COMMERCE.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 20496) to amend section 15 of the act to regulate commerce, as amended June 29, 1906, and June 18, 1910.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and the bill is ordered stricken from the calendar.

SALE OF LAND TO TOWN OF TEMPE, ARIZ.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 11253) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell to the town of Tempe, Ariz., a tract of land containing road-making material.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I am inclined to object to this bill unless some very good reason can be advanced.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, the author of the bill is not here, but this bill only involves a very small tract; but I have not the facts fresh in my memory.

Mr. STAFFORD. The report says this is part of a monument and it might affect the scenic beauty of that monument. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects, and the bill is ordered stricken from the calendar.

FALSE ADVERTISING IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 4931) to prevent false advertising in the District of Columbia.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this bill, I see, provides a jury shall determine the penalty. Is that the case in the District of Columbia in other matters? It provides a jury shall determine the penalties.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that after the bill was reported some inaccuracies were found in it, and it has been carried along with a view that they might be perfected by the author of the bill, but we have not yet corrected them.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks that this bill be passed without prejudice. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

BRIDGE ACROSS ST. LOUIS RIVER BETWEEN MINNESOTA AND WISCONSIN.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 5325) authorizing the county of St. Louis to construct a bridge across the St. Louis River between Minnesota and Wisconsin.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman objects, and the bill is ordered stricken from the calendar.

FEDERAL BUILDING, POCATELLO, IDAHO.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 4920) to increase the cost of construction of the Federal building at Pocatello, Idaho.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection.

Mr. BORLAND and Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. BORLAND. I will withhold my objection if the gentleman desires to submit a statement.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I wish to call attention to the fact that this bill provides for an increase in the appropriation for the Federal building at Pocatello, where work has already been begun, the basement being completed; but work was suspended about eight months ago, with the expectation of getting an additional appropriation. The population of the town has increased very materially since the original appropriation was made, and the present building is not in conformity with the improvements of the city and the growing community around it.

An appropriation of $100,000 for this building was made in the Sixty-second Congress; but because of the increase in the price of materials since the appropriation was made it was found that a building which would furnish sufficient accommodations for the Federal officers at Pocatello could not be constructed for this amount, and the plans were modified and a new contract let. Without this additional appropriation the building will necessarily have to be constructed of brick with sandstone trimmings and terra cotta belt course, and it is believed that a Federal building in a city of this size and importance, where so many Federal officers have quarters, should be constructed of stone. A new depot is being erected here at a cost of $250,000, which conveys an idea of the importance of the city. The postal receipts for the last fiscal year were $30,467.46.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What was the original limit of cost?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The original limit of cost was $100,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How large a population?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. About 12,000 population now.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much increase is asked?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Twenty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is too much. If you can not get a building for $100,000 in a community of 12,000 people we ought to quit building public buildings.

Mr. STAFFORD. The report says this is to be used for other purposes than a post office.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not care if it is.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. It is to be used for other purposes, including the Federal Court, the Forest Service, Weather Bureau, and so forth.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the gentleman from Idaho making his statement at that time as to the bill and have them appear in the RECORD, but I feel that this is no time to increase these estimates, especially in a city of that size, and I object. If the gentleman wants to add anything to what he has already said he can go ahead.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I do not care, of course, to take up the time of the House if the gentleman insists on objecting.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The bill is ordered stricken from the calendar.

PIKE NATIONAL PARK.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 18747) to reserve certain lands and to incorporate the same and make them part of the Pike National Forest.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Colorado; we have just established a national park out in Colorado——

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Rocky Mountain Park.

Mr. KEATING. This is not intended to establish a new national park.

Mr. BORLAND. Practically; it is to enlarge one.

Mr. KEATING. No; that is not the idea. It is simply to carry out a policy of the Forestry Service which is cooperating with towns in the mining sections of Colorado and other Western States for the purpose of safeguarding the water supply. This bill takes into the forest a sufficient amount of ground to safeguard the water supply of a stream that furnishes the city of Idaho Springs with water. If this bill is passed, the Forestry Service will enter into a contract with the city of Idaho Springs by which that particular district will be regulated, and the matter of pasturing cattle in that district and other questions affecting the safeguarding of the city's water supply will be taken up and an agreement entered into by which the city will probably pay a part of the cost of policing the district.

Mr. BORLAND. What progress has been made by the city toward assuming these burdens? It seems to be for their benefit.

Mr. KEATING. If the city does not do it, the Forest Service will not be obligated.

Mr. BORLAND. Is it anything more than retaining these lands?

Mr. KEATING. It simply includes them in the forest reserve.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

PAYMENT OF PENSION SURGEONS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was House joint resolution No. 294, providing for payment of surgeons making examination at claimant's home in connection with claim pending in the Bureau of Pensions.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and the Clerk will report the next bill.

APPLICATIONS FOR LETTERS PATENT, ETC.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill H. R. 2036, to extend temporarily the time of filing applications for letters patent and registration in the Patent Office.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ADDITIONAL LAND DISTRICT IN CALIFORNIA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill H. R. 17388, creating an additional land district in the State of California, embracing lands contained in the county of Imperial, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and the bill will be stricken from the calendar. The Clerk will report the next bill.

NONAPPRAISEMENT OF MERCHANDISE, PEMBINA, N. DAK.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill S. 5449, to make Pembina, N. Dak., a port through which merchandise may be imported for transportation without appraisement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I object to that.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will withhold his objection.

Mr. BORLAND. Does the gentleman want to make a statement? If so, I withhold my objection.

Mr. NORTON. Yes; I would like to make a statement. I trust the gentleman will not be so indifferent to the welfare of other portions of the country than his own as to object to this bill. There is much need for this legislation, and I can not see any reason why anyone should have an objection to giving the privilege of the first section of the act of June 10, 1880, to this port. There is a great deal of freight coming from Canada to the port of Pembina and consigned to Duluth, Minneapolis, and St. Paul, that can be better appraised at these ports than at Pembina. And that is the purpose of this act.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman will know by reference to the previous history of this House that we passed a bill to have the Customs Service reorganized, and under that President Taft reorganized that service and established certain districts, and he has abolished certain offices and centralized certain other divisions, and this is one of the attempts which are being made now constantly to add new ports of entry in addition to that system.

Mr. NORTON. The gentleman apparently has not read this bill at all.

Mr. BORLAND. This is a new port of entry.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken. This does not affect the reorganization at all.

Mr. BORLAND. This adds a new port of entry.

Mr. MANN. Not at all. We have passed a great many of these. It is only a matter of convenience for the Treasury Department and importers. It does not add anything whatever to the expense of the Government. It does not create a new district, and it does not affect the reorganization.

Mr. BORLAND. Is the gentleman prepared to say that this does not add anything to the expense of the Government?

Mr. MANN. It does not.

Mr. BORLAND. How can that be, providing for appraisement at a port where no appraisement has heretofore been had?

Mr. MANN. There is no more expense in appraising it there than there is about appraising it at the other place.

Mr. BORLAND. That is a mere matter of conjecture.

Mr. MANN. We frequently have had that report from the Treasury Department. I do not speak from personal experience. We passed all these bills that have been recommended by the Treasury Department and by the Committee on Ways and Means. It does not affect the reorganization in any sense whatever. If it did, I would object.

Mr. BORLAND. It evidently enlarges the reorganization plan.

Mr. MANN. Oh, not at all.

Mr. NORTON. It certainly does not.

Mr. BORLAND. I have not any objection to the gentleman putting a statement in the RECORD.

Mr. NORTON. I do not care at all about making a statement. I want this bill passed, and I think it should pass. It does not add a cent of expense to the Government.

Mr. BORLAND. I expect to object to its passage under unanimous consent, I will say to the gentleman. If he wants to offer anything else, it is all right.

Mr. NORTON. Why do you object to it?

Mr. BORLAND. Because I do not think it properly belongs on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

Mr. NORTON. Has the gentleman read the bill?

Mr. BORLAND. I have not.

Mr. NORTON. I think the gentleman ought to read it before assuming the responsibility of objecting.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] that during the past two years we have passed more than a dozen of these bills on the recommendation of the Treasury Department.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the bill be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed without prejudice. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the next bill.

BRIDGE ACROSS MISSISSIPPI RIVER, MUSCATINE, IOWA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill H. R. 17907 granting the consent of Congress to the Interstate Bridge & Terminal Co., of Muscatine, Iowa, to build a bridge across the Mississippi River.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Interstate Bridge & Terminal Co., of Muscatine, Iowa, and its successors and assigns to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Mississippi River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation at or near Muscatine, in the county of Muscatine, in the State of Iowa, in accordance with the provision of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to inquire whether this project is one in process of formation, whether the company has already been organized, or whether it is merely for the purpose of exploitation, to ascertain whether ultimately there will be capital sufficient to build the bridge?

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the author of the bill to answer that question, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. VOLLMER].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. VOLLMER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am yielding, Mr. Speaker, for an answer to my question.

Mr. VOLLMER. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. Speaker, that this is a bill in which the people of Muscatine, in the district I have the honor to represent, and across the river, in the district of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TAVENNER], are very much interested. They have sent communications from their commercial bodies and their boards of supervisors and the City Council of Muscatine and prominent people there vouching for this measure; that it is not a scheme of promotion, or anything of that kind, but a proposition that is intended to bring electric railway communication between the two sides of the river; and they hope and believe that as soon as the money market eases up they will be able to make arrangements to get their money and get an electric road to cross this bridge.

Mr. STAFFORD. When was the company formed for this purpose?

Mr. VOLLMER. I think three or four months ago.

Mr. STAFFORD. Are there any substantial backers behind it?

Mr. VOLLMER. Yes; Kansas City people and Muscatine people are back of this project, and they are said to be entirely responsible.

Mr. ADAMSON. Question.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next one.

INTERNATIONAL DRY-FARMING CONGRESS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 382) authorizing the President to extend invitations to other nations to send representatives to the International Dry-Farming Congress, to be held at Denver, Colo., September 27 to October 8, inclusive, 1915.

The title of the joint resolution was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President is hereby authorized to extend invitations to other nations to appoint delegates or representatives to the International Dry-Farming Congress, to be held at Denver, Colo., September twenty-seventh to October eighth, inclusive, 1915: Provided, That no appropriation shall be granted for the expenses of delegates or for other expenses incurred in connection with the said congress.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the House joint resolution.

The House joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next one.

EXCHANGE OF FOREST LANDS WITH THE STATE OF OREGON.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 49) to provide for the exchange with the State of Oregon of certain school lands and indemnity rights within the national forests of that State for an equal area of national forest land.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The bill is stricken from the calendar. The Clerk will report the next one.

CONTRACTS UNDER RECLAMATION ACT.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 124) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to investigate and settle certain accounts under the reclamation acts, and for other purposes.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

THE SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects. The bill is stricken from the calendar. The Clerk will report the next one.

NONAPPRAISEMENT OF MERCHANDISE, PEMBINA, N. DAK.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I objected a few minutes ago to calendar No. 377, Senate bill 5449, to make Pembina, N. Dak., a port through which merchandise may be imported for transportation without appraisement. I want to withdraw that objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] asks unanimous consent to withdraw his objection to Calendar No. 377. Is there objection?

Mr. CLINE. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana objects. The Clerk will report the next one.

RETIREMENT OF CERTAIN OFFICERS OF PHILIPPINE SCOUTS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 1281) providing for the retirement of certain officers of the Philippine Scouts.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The bill is stricken from the calendar. The Clerk will report the next one.

Mr. PETERSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman withhold his objection a moment? I would like to make a statement about that.

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. PETERSON. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill for the relief of Capt. John J. Clark. It applies to only one man. Capt. Clark was a soldier of the Civil War and served in that war until its close, and after that he served in the Regular Army. His entire service has amounted to over 40 years. After that he joined the Philippine Scouts, and his service in all aggregates nearly 53 years. Unfortunately the law is such that he can not be retired. This bill is to relieve that situation and retire this old soldier. It seems to me this bill ought to be permitted to pass.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, that is the objection I have to this bill. It is general in form, but it is intended to apply to only one person. If it is to apply to one person only, it should have been introduced as such and placed on the Private Calendar.

Mr. PETERSON. This bill has passed the Senate twice, and has been favorably reported here twice by the Committee on Military Affairs, and the War Department has approved it, and it is certainly just and right that it should be passed.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois withdraw his objection?

Mr. MANN. No.

The SPEAKER. The bill is stricken from the calendar. The Clerk will report the next one.

SHOSHONE INDIANS IN WYOMING.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 14869) authorizing the Shoshone Tribe of Indians residing on the Wind River Reservation in Wyoming to submit claims to the Court of Claims.

The title of the bill was read.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order against that bill, for the reason that the committee that reported it had no jurisdiction even to consider or report it. It should have gone to the Committee on Claims. It is here improperly. The committee had no jurisdiction whatever to consider it.

The SPEAKER. What committee reported it?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. The Committee on Indian Affairs.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman's objection comes too late.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. No. I call the attention of the Chair to the second paragraph of Rule XXII.

Mr. MANN. Paragraph 4 of Rule XXII.

The SPEAKER. What does the gentleman read from?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. House Rules, Rule XXII, paragraphs 2 and 4. I call the Chair's attention to these words in paragraph 2:

Any petition or memorial or private bill excluded under this rule shall be returned to the Member from whom it was received; and petitions and private bills which have been inappropriately referred may, by the direction of the committee having possession of the same, be properly referred in the manner originally presented; and an erroneous reference of a petition or private bill under this clause shall not confer jurisdiction upon the committee to consider or report the same.

Now, in the footnote to that it says:

The erroneous reference of a private bill to a committee not entitled to jurisdiction does not confer it, and a point of order is good when the bill comes up for consideration either in the House or in Committee of the Whole.

It refers to Hinds' Precedents, volume 4, section 4382.

The SPEAKER. What is this bill about?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. It authorizes a band of Indians to sue the United States Government, and to be paid out of the Public Treasury in case they recover a judgment. In other words, it is a claim to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, and not out of Indian funds. Now, if the Chair does not happen to remember it, I call the attention of the Chair to paragraph 16 of Rule XI, which defines the things to be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs:

The relations of the United States with the Indians and Indian tribes, including appropriations therefor.

The footnote says:

This committee has a broad jurisdiction of subjects relating to the care, the education, and management of the Indians, including the care and allotment of their lands. It also reports both general and special bills as to claims which are paid out of Indian funds.

The bill here does not provide that it shall be paid out of the Indian funds, but it is to be paid out of the Public Treasury, which clearly carries it to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman might also cite paragraph 27 of Rule XI, stating the jurisdiction of the Committee on Claims.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Yes. If the Speaker will pardon me, I will call attention to that:

To private and domestic claims and demands, other than war claims, against the United States—to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. Speaker, there are great numbers of these private bills being referred to the various committees. If this claim stood alone, I should not make the point.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will inquire of the gentleman: Is this a private bill or a public bill?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. It is a private bill.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken.

Mr. MILLER. This is not a private bill.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Oh, yes; it is.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. In a moment.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. The fact that it is a band of Indians taken together does not make it a public bill any more than if it was a bill for the relief of one Indian.

The SPEAKER. If this is a private bill, it has no business on this calendar, anyway.

Mr. MILLER. That is certainly granted, but I do not agree with the proposition that it is a private bill.

The SPEAKER. Why not?

Mr. MILLER. It is a bill in relation to the rights of certain Indians who are wards of the Government, who are not represented here in any capacity whatever. Any bill that affects their welfare, their lands, their property, must of itself be a public bill, as far as the United States is concerned. It is not for the benefit of any private individual, corporation, or concern in the United States. It is a public matter, dealing with our relations with the Indian tribes. If the bill were a private bill, there could be no question whatever about the gentleman's statement that it was erroneously referred. But it is not a private bill.

I also desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that bills of this character have been referred to and considered by the Indian Affairs Committee without question for a great many years. Certainly for all the time I have been a member of that committee, which is six years, nobody has thought of raising the point that bills of this kind were not properly referred to that committee.

Section 16 of rule 686 gives the Committee on Indian Affairs jurisdiction over all bills that deal with the relations of the United States with the Indians and the Indian tribes, including appropriations therefor.

The footnote, referring to this committee, says:

It has a broad jurisdiction of subjects relating to the care, education, and management of the Indians, including the care and allotment of their lands.

The subject matter of the bill we are considering deals with two treaties made between the United States and Indian tribes; it also deals with public laws of the United States; the relations between the United States and Indian tribes as such in their very essence are public, not private.

Then, too, this bill deals with the allotment of Indian lands. It proposes that there shall be an inquiry into the treaties made controlling allotment of the Indian lands, and also an inquiry into whether or not in the allotment of the Shoshone Indian lands we have violated the terms of those treaties.

Let me also call the Chair's attention to the fact that the Indian Committee has jurisdiction, as everyone admits, of claims arising from Indian depredations, and this whether the Indians complained of have funds in the hands of the United States out of which the claims can be paid or not.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. May I interrupt the gentleman?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. MILLER. I do not understand that I have the floor, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Then I will say what I want to say in my own right. The condition that the gentleman refers to is just what induced me to make this point. In order to keep these claims within proper bounds it has been thought advisable that they should be properly coordinated by sending them all to one committee when they are to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

But the gentleman says an abuse has grown up in that committee, and I agree with him that it has, and that is what I have in mind in raising this point of order, to get this thing back where it belongs.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. The gentleman is entirely mistaken in saying this question has never been raised in the Committee on Indian Affairs. It has been often raised and was always sustained when I was chairman of the committee, and I think it has universally been held when the question has been raised that the Indian Committee is without jurisdiction.

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, with due respect to the distinguished gentleman from South Dakota and with due deference to his personal recollection as to what he did when he was chairman of the committee, I still maintain that not at any time since I have been a member of that committee has that point ever been raised, except when the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD], who now raises the point here, raised it in the committee a few weeks ago.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will ask the gentleman from South Dakota, Is this a private bill or a public bill, in the gentleman's opinion?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. There is some doubt about it, but I am inclined to think it is a public bill. Many of this class of bills provide for appropriating the money that may be recovered in the judgment, and universally they have gone on the Union Calendar. Perhaps this bill is different in that respect. Recently we passed a bill restoring the annuities to the Santee Sioux. That bill was on the Union Calendar, and I think that has been the universal practice. If it is a private bill, of course it does not belong on this calendar.

Mr. MILLER. That was the point I started to make. These bills go to the Union Calendar. This bill is on the Union Calendar. A private bill is never placed on the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER. Yes, but the way this bill got on the Unanimous Consent Calendar is that it was erroneously referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. MILLER. Yes, but in addition to that, will the Speaker allow me to call his attention to what it seems to me is the determining factor? This bill proposes to deal with the relations between the United States and a band of Indians, not between the United States and a citizen of the United States. If it did, the bill would be a private bill and a private claim.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MILLER. This contemplates the consideration of the conduct of the United States in its trust capacity in relation to the property belonging to a large band of Indians, and it does not seem to me that it could from any point of view be considered as a private measure. It is a public measure. It deals with a public question. If the relations between the United States Government and a band of Indians are not a public question, I can not possibly conceive of anything that would be a public question.

The SPEAKER. Nobody understands or can define the exact relations between the Indian tribes and the United States. Sometimes they are treated as independent and sometimes as wards of the Nation.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. In considering the importance of this as disclosed by what the gentleman from Minnesota says, the habit is growing up in several committees of taking jurisdiction of these bills, and that is the reason that I am opposing it, and I say that it is a private bill.

The SPEAKER. Why does the gentleman say it is a private bill?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. A private bill does not necessarily have to be a bill for a private individual. It might be for Jim Jones, and it might be for some particular corporation composed of a hundred men, or an individual company composed of a million men. Still the single unit you are dealing with makes it a private bill. This is not dealing with the Indians generally; it is dealing with a band of Indians as a consolidated unit that seeks to recover from the United States Government some money because that particular unit received some injury. It does not apply to all Indians. If it was for Jim Crow or Big Feather it would be a private bill, and the fact that it is for a particular band does not prevent its being still a single unit, and it does not apply to any other Indian tribe, and therefore, I say, is a private bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, to save any question about the matter I object.

Mr. FERRIS. Will not the gentleman withhold his objection and let the Speaker rule upon it for the benefit of the Indian Committee?

Mr. MANN. It is just because I think the Speaker ought not to be called upon to determine this question at this time without an opportunity to consult precedents that I have objected.

Mr. FERRIS. I have no desire to hurry the matter except to point out, as the House will remember, that when the Indian Committee had its bill in here the chairman of the committee ruled that everything subject to a point of order was a gratuity appropriation out of the Treasury. Now the gentleman rules that the Indian Committee has no authority to deal at all with these matters, but I want to call attention to the fact that the jurisdiction of the Indian Committee is slipping away pretty fast and soon will not have anything left.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; I think not. I went over this matter when the bill was reported, and I was in doubt about it. I do not think the Speaker ought to be called upon to rule offhand, and I was going to object, anyhow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and the bill will be stricken from the calendar.

MANUFACTURE OF DENATURED ALCOHOL.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill H. R. 9591, to permit the manufacture of denatured alcohol by mixing domestic and wood alcohol while in process of distillation.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That notwithstanding anything contained in the act entitled "An act for the withdrawal from bond, tax free, of domestic alcohol when rendered unfit for beverage or liquid medicinal uses by mixture with suitable denaturing materials," approved June 7, 1906, or the act amendatory to same approved March 2, 1907, or subsection 2 of subsection N of the act approved October 3, 1913, amendatory to same, domestic alcohol while it is in its nascent condition, before it has passed from the state of vapor, or while in the original closed and continuous process of distillation, may be denatured by so mixing with it the vapors or condensed vapors arising from the destructive distillation of wood or other denaturing material or materials or admixture of the same as to render such alcohol unfit for use as an intoxicating beverage and thereupon shall be directly conveyed from the still by continuous closed pipes to locked and sealed receptacles, from which it may be withdrawn under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe.

SEC. 2. That where such alcohol is of insufficient proof to be denatured the same may be transferred in bond from such locked and sealed receptacles, free of tax, to a central distilling and denaturing plant, as provided for in subsection 2 of subsection N of the act approved October 3, 1913, where such alcohol may be redistilled and denatured when sufficient denaturants shall not already have been mixed with said alcohol, as hereinbefore provided, under such regulations and upon the execution of such notices and bonds as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask some member of the Ways and Means Committee as to the reason that the bill was not submitted to the Treasury Department for condemnation or approval. I notice there is no reference whatever in the report to its having been submitted to the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. MOORE. The bill was introduced by my colleague [Mr. PALMER], and he was very much interested in it. It had the approval of the committee. As he is not here at the moment I ask that it be passed without prejudice.

Mr. STAFFORD. I notice that the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee has just come in. While the gentleman was temporarily absent I made an inquiry as to the reason the bill was not submitted to the Treasury Department for its approval or disapproval.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman that I have not had charge of the bill personally. It was referred to a subcommittee, of which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. PALMER] was chairman, and he reported the bill. My understanding is that he had the matter up with the Treasury Department and they stated that it would not interfere with the revenue. It was a unanimous report from the Ways and Means Committee; the Members on both sides agreed to the bill. I am not in a position to give the gentleman full information because I have not given it any detailed study.

Mr. STAFFORD. I was not so much concerned about the first section of the bill as about the second section, which involves a question of practice as to the operation of making denatured alcohol which I think should be submitted to the commissioner general of internal revenue for his opinion. I have no objection to the bill being passed over without prejudice.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman that I do not like to make a statement from memory without I am positive, but I am quite positive that this bill did go to the Treasury Department and met with its approval.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am in sympathy with the object sought to be obtained by the bill, particularly the first section, which seeks to legalize a new practice in making denatured alcohol, but I was thinking whether the second section might not meet with some objection from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not know the bill was coming up and therefore I have not the papers here, but I am satisfied in my own mind that it was submitted to the Treasury Department and met with its approval, or it would not have been reported by the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, I have read the bill a number of times, and I have serious doubts whether it will accomplish the purpose which it seeks to accomplish, and that is whether the new mixture of denatured alcohol will be free from tax. I think it had better be looked into before it is passed to see whether that is so or not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That would not hurt the Government any.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No; but it would be better not to pass the bill unless it is going to accomplish the object sought.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. On what ground does the gentleman think the bill does not free the alcohol from tax?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Will the gentleman show me where, in the bill, it does free it from tax?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It says "notwithstanding anything contained in the act entitled 'An act for the withdrawal from bond, tax free, of domestic alcohol,'" and so forth.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. But that is only giving the title of another bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The bill puts the new process under the same process and the same conditions as the act providing for the manufacture of denatured alcohol.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I do not think it does. I think it gives the right to mix the vapors or condensed vapors, which mixing heretofore has not been allowed; but, after it is mixed, I doubt if the bill relieves it of the tax.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not see why.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Because it does not say so in so many words. I do not know that I am opposed to the bill. I am really seeking an explanation of its provisions with the view of determining whether I am for it or not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Here is the situation in reference to the bill: The general provisions of an act passed some years ago provide that denatured alcohol shall not be taxed. That is proposition No. 1. In the bill that became a law some time ago the way of denaturing alcohol was described in the bill. This method of denaturing alcohol is to denature it by mixing the vapors instead of after it has become a liquid.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will read line 4, page 2, he will find that he is mistaken in that respect. There it speaks of condensed vapors, and condensed vapor is a liquid.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The process is intended to run the vapors out of one pipe system, or whatever it may be called, and as they go into the condensing pipe they go in together, where they will be denatured.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. If the condensing pipe is the worm, and there is no provision for other than one worm, then it goes from the still and must come from the one condensing pipe or worm; and the bill provides, in lines 3 and 4, page 2, that the condensed vapors may be mixed.

Mr. STAFFORD. But in line 3 it says "vapors."

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. It says "vapors or condensed vapors." Vapor is one thing and condensed vapor is another.

Mr. STAFFORD. It permits both.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. This bill provides:

> Or while in the original closed and continuous process of distillation, may be denatured by so mixing with it the vapors or condensed vapors arising from the destructive distillation of wood or other denaturing material or materials.

In other words, the purpose of the bill is to allow the man who makes the denatured alcohol to run the vapors of wood alcohol together with the vapors of grain alcohol, and I suppose that when they go through the worm, as the gentleman calls it, where they are condensed into liquid form, the two classes of alcohol become condensed together, and the result is that you have an alcohol that has a sufficient amount of wood alcohol in it to prevent it from being used for drinking purposes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. This goes further than that, however. The first vapor that comes from the worm, or the condensing pipe, if you choose to call it that, is of very high proof, and the longer vapor continues to come into the pipe and flow from it the lower in proof it becomes. Section 2 provides that this condensed vapor, or liquid, may be shipped in bond from one place to another when it is of "insufficient proof" to be denatured.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think that is the law to-day. There are certain classes of alcohol that can be shipped in bond.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Oh, yes; whisky can be shipped in bond, but it would have to pay a tax of $1.10 on a measured gallon instead of $1.10 on a proof gallon if it were below 100 proof.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. That is when it comes out with an insufficient degree of wood alcohol in the balance of the alcohol to be of the test that the inspectors require in order to say that it amounts to denatured alcohol.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, the second section provides that it shall be transported under those conditions free of tax.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes; it can be transported free of tax, but when you are transporting it free of tax it is still in bond, and when it comes out of bond it must or must not pay the tax, and there is no provision in the bill which says in so many words that it shall not pay the tax when it comes out of bond. You can ship whisky from Kentucky to California in bond, but when it gets out to California, before it gets out of bond, the tax must be paid. There is no direct provision in this bill which says that the tax on these goods shall not be paid.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman is mistaken about that, because he does not read this in the light of the present law.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Oh, yes; I will say to the gentleman that I have read the present law in connection with it, and I fail to comprehend it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman will allow me, I will try and explain it again. If there is sufficient denaturant which goes into the alcohol in this process, then it becomes denatured alcohol, and no denatured alcohol is taxed under the general law. Therefore, it is not subject to tax. If, during the process, the alcohol comes out, and there is not sufficient denatured alcohol to come up to the requirements of the law, then for mechanical purposes they are allowed to ship it in bond, if used for mechanical purposes, such as they are allowed to ship alcohol for to-day.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. What advantage is there in mixing it?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman that I am not sufficiently familiar with this process to know, except that I know there are certain gentlemen who have a process—I am not sure whether it is patented or not——

Mr. MADDEN. Is it intended to take the place of gasoline?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, no. Alcohol is used in the arts for a great many purposes.

Mr. MADDEN. I know it is.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And they contend that if you denature it in this way they can produce denatured alcohol very much more cheaply than they can by the process of denaturing it as it is used to-day.

Mr. MADDEN. And they could use it for the same purpose for which gasoline is now used?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Probably for some purposes for which gasoline is used, but alcohol is used for a good many purposes that gasoline could not be used for.

Mr. MADDEN. Oh, yes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, I was a member of the committee at the time this bill was considered, and while I did not hear all that was presented, I was present at the committee when some of the hearings were had. The proposition was that under this process the denaturized alcohol was made by a single process, whereas as it is now made it requires a double one. First, you manufacture the alcohol and then you subsequently denaturize it. These gentlemen have a process, which they propose to test, which produces the denatured alcohol in one process, thereby greatly reducing the cost of it. Now, as to the use of it, it will be used in whatever way denatured alcohol is used.

Mr. MADDEN. Does this strengthen it at all or make it better for fuel?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. It is not made better or worse.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do not think it makes it any better or worse, as the gentleman from Missouri says. It is only the question that these men claim they can make cheaper denatured alcohol in this way. I do not say they can or not, but I think it is worth while that they should be given the opportunity.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. As it is now, they can not even experiment in it without violating the internal-revenue law.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that this bill may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That notwithstanding anything contained in the act entitled "An act for the withdrawal from bond, tax free, of domestic alcohol when rendered unfit for beverage or liquid medicinal uses by mixture with suitable denaturing materials," approved June 7, 1906, or the act amendatory to same approved March 2, 1907, or subsection 2 of subsection N of the act approved October 3, 1913, amendatory to same, domestic alcohol while it is in its nascent condition, before it has passed from the state of vapor, or while in the original closed and continuous process of distillation, may be denatured by so mixing with it the vapors or condensed vapors arising from the destructive distillation of wood or other denaturing material or materials or admixture of the same as to render such alcohol unfit for use as an intoxicating beverage and thereupon shall be directly conveyed from the still by continuous closed pipes to locked and sealed receptacles from which it may be withdrawn under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe.

SEC. 2. That where such alcohol is of insufficient proof to be denatured the same may be transferred in bond from such locked and sealed receptacles, free of tax, to a central distilling and denaturing plant, as provided for in subsection 2 of subsection N of the act approved October 3, 1913, where such alcohol may be redistilled and denatured when sufficient denaturants shall not already have been mixed with said alcohol, as hereinbefore provided, under such regulations and upon the execution of such notices and bonds as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

SHOSHONE TRIBE OF INDIANS.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, during my absence from the Hall a few moments ago Unanimous Consent Calendar No. 385 was called and some disposition made of it. I desire to know what disposition was made of the case.

The SPEAKER. It was stricken from the calendar.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Was the question raised as to the jurisdiction of the Committee on Indian Affairs?

The SPEAKER. There were four or five questions raised, and finally the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] settled the whole squabble by objecting.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then it was objected to and went off the calendar on that ground and not on the ground of the lack of jurisdiction of the Committee on Indian Affairs?

The SPEAKER. No; the Chair is going to investigate that matter.

LOBSTER-REARING STATION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 4725) providing for the establishment of a lobster-rearing station at some suitable point on the Atlantic coast.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The bill is ordered stricken from the calendar.

ENTRIES UNDER ACT OF MAY 29, 1908.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 5629) for the relief of certain persons who made entry under the provisions of section 6, act of May 29, 1908.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all entries made by beneficiaries under section 6 of the act of Congress approved May 29, 1908, entitled "An act authorizing a resurvey of certain townships in the State of Wyoming, and for other purposes" (35 Stat., p. 465), in connection with which such beneficiaries have submitted proof of their compliance with the homestead law in Wisconsin, and where such proof shows full five years' residence and improvements on the Wisconsin land, to which their title failed by reason of the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of the Wisconsin Central Railroad Co. v. Forsythe (159 U. S., p. 46), whether such entry is now being asserted by the original entryman or by his transferee, be, and the same are hereby, confirmed, and the Secretary of the Interior is directed to issue patents thereon: Provided, That this legislation is to be construed as only removing the objection with relation to transfer, heretofore raised by the Interior Department against said entries, and is not to be construed as confirming entries, if any, made for lands not subject to entry or entries made by persons not entitled thereto: Provided further, That if any of the said entries under the remedial act or amendments thereto have been canceled and the lands embraced therein reentered by intervening adverse claimants, such canceled entries are not to be reinstated and validated by this act, but the right to make new locations in lieu thereof for lands subject to homestead entry is hereby granted.

The committee amendment was read as follows:

Page 2, strike out after the word "act," line 17, the comma and the words "but the right to make locations in lieu thereof for land subject to homestead entry is hereby granted."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter from the report from the Department of the Interior.

The SPEAKER. On this bill?

Mr. FERRIS. A report on this identical bill.

The SPEAKER. What is the request?

Mr. FERRIS. The request is to print in the RECORD a letter from the department's report on this identical bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a letter from the department about this bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The letter referred to is as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, June 18, 1914.

Hon. HENRY L. MYERS,
Chairman Committee on Public Lands,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR: By your reference I have for report Senate bill 5629, for the relief of certain persons who settled under the homestead laws upon certain lands which were lost to them because of conflict with the grant to the Wisconsin Central Railroad.

Congress has on three occasions legislated respecting the homestead settlers on the lands found to belong to the Wisconsin Central Railroad Co. The first was the act of April 19, 1904 (33 Stat., 184); the second, the act of May 29, 1908 (35 Stat., 465); the third was the joint resolution No. 164 of June 25, 1910 (36 Stat., 885).

A number of entries were made under said legislation by the alleged beneficiaries, and it appeared that agreements had been made by them prior to entry for the transfer of the lands to be so entered.

In the test case of Leopold Bauer, decided by the department February 21, 1910 (38 L. D., 460), adhered to on review and rereview (39 L. D., 304), the department held that the remedial legislation referred to contemplated merely that in making homestead entries for other lands for their own benefit the entrymen should be credited for the time spent and improvements made on the Wisconsin lands, but did not grant a scrip right nor authorize agreement prior to entry for transfer of the lands to be entered thereunder.

It appears that the entry of Bauer was canceled on August 6, 1913.

The action of the department was predicated upon its view as to the proper construction to be placed upon said remedial legislation, which, in the opinion of the department, did not authorize transfer of the right of entry, but merely authorized entries to be made by the beneficiaries for their own use and benefit. The present legislation obviates the objection theretofore raised by the department and provides for confirmation of the entries whether such entries are now being asserted by the original entrymen or by transferees. The department is not at all averse to this legislation, inasmuch as it appears that the settlers made their settlements and improvements upon lands supposed to be public lands and lost their claims without any fault of their own. Having in effect earned title to the former lands, which could not be given them because the lands were not public lands of the United States, they may very properly be accorded the right to transfer the additional lands, and any agreements to do so made prior to entry may be allowed if Congress desires to grant such privilege.

It is believed, however, that the following provisions should be added to the proposed bill, viz:

"Provided, That this legislation is to be construed as only removing the objections with relation to transfer, heretofore raised by the Interior Department against said entries, and is not to be construed as confirming entries, if any, made for lands not subject to entry or entries made by persons not entitled thereto: And provided further, That if any of the said entries under the remedial act or amendments thereto have been canceled and the lands embraced therein reentered by intervening adverse claimants, such canceled entries are not to be reinstated and validated by this act, but the right to make new locations in lieu thereof for lands subject to homestead entry is hereby granted."

Respectfully,

A. A. JONES,
First Assistant Secretary.

NONAPPRAISEMENT OF GOODS AT NYANDO, N. Y.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 17982) to make Nyando, N. Y., a port through which merchandise may be imported for transportation without appraisement.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I want to say to the House that this bill seems to be similar to Calendar No. 377, providing that same privilege for Pembina, N. Dak. I withdrew my objection to the other bill, being convinced that it was a measure that ought to pass in the interest of the efficiency of the service, and I hope these two bills will be taken up together, and I ask unanimous consent that Calendar Nos. 377 and 391 be taken up together, as they are exactly similar bills.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that Calendar No. 377, at the foot of the first page of the calendar, and Calendar No. 391, being similar, shall be taken up together.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, as the gentleman from Missouri has stated, these bills are similar in their purpose. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CLINE] a few minutes ago objected to Calendar No. 377, but since having more carefully considered the bill I am advised has no objection to it now.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report 377.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that both bills may be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

NONAPPRAISEMENT OF MERCHANDISE, PEMBINA, N. DAK.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 5449) to make Pembina, N. Dak., a port through which merchandise may be imported for transportation without appraisement.

Be it enacted, etc., That the privileges of the first section of the act approved June 10, 1880, governing the immediate transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement be, and the same are hereby, extended to the port of Pembina, N. Dak.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

NYANDO, N. Y.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 17982) to make Nyando, N. Y., a port through which merchandise may be imported for transportation without appraisement.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the privileges of the first section of the act approved June 10, 1880, governing the immediate transportation of dutiable merchandise without appraisement be, and the same are hereby, extended to the port of Nyando, N. Y.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

RESERVATION OF SCHOOL LANDS IN ALASKA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 20851) to reserve lands in the Territory of Alaska for educational uses and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it seems to me this bill is one which ought to receive some discussion and consideration in the House.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] is familiar with it and I hope he will reply to the gentleman and give all the information the gentleman desires.

Mr. MANN. As I understand this bill it would not raise any money immediately for school purposes.

Mr. LENROOT. When the coal lands are leased it will.

Mr. MANN. When the coal lands are leased. Is the money received from that put in a fund?

Mr. LENROOT. Put in a fund and the income therefrom shall be available only.

Mr. MANN. So necessarily it would raise no money very soon.

Mr. LENROOT. No; I will state to the gentleman the object of the bill is not with the idea of any substantial amount being raised at this time, but surveys are being made and lands are being entered. The purpose of the bill and all that it does is to make reservation of these school sections, a certain amount of the land when the lands are surveyed, if they are nonmineral in character.

Mr. MANN. I do not know that I would have any objection to the passage of the bill, but it does involve some questions which I think ought to be considered and discussed.

Mr. LENROOT. I will say to the gentleman that the bill as originally introduced was a very sweeping one, and attempted to make a grant of land to establish a college, and many other things. The committee simply cut all of that out of the bill and simply provide for the reservation and the income from leased lands to go into a territorial fund, the principal of which will remain intact and the income used for school purposes.

Mr. MANN. Of course, it is almost self-evident, maybe not quite, that this bill will not become a law at this session of Congress, owing to the situation in the Senate, and it seems to me that a bill of this character, involving the question and, I might say, almost a novel proposition, ought to be discussed somewhat in the House, and not passed by unanimous consent without any consideration. I do not know but that I am in hearty accord with the propositions in the bill, but I think it ought to be considered in the House, and, with some regret, I shall have to object at present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects.

Mr. MANN. I am perfectly willing to pass it over.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed without prejudice. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the next bill.

TO PLACE BARROW COUNTY, GA., IN EASTERN DIVISION, NORTHERN DISTRICT.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 20688) to place Barrow County, Ga., in the eastern district of the northern district of Georgia.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to make one inquiry. What is the name of this county?

Mr. LEE of Georgia. It is Barrow County.

Mr. MANN. It is Barrow, and not Bartow?

Mr. LEE of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I want to amend in line 3.

The SPEAKER. You have not unanimous consent to consider the bill as yet.

Mr. MANN. The bill has one name and the report another.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the county of Bartow, in the State of Georgia, is hereby attached to and made a part of the eastern division of the northern judicial district of said State.

Mr. LEE of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment. I should like to amend in line 3 by inserting the word "Barrow" in place of the word "Bartow."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

The title was amended to conform with the text.

LEGISLATIVE REFERENCE DIVISION, LIBRARY OF CONGRESS.

The next bill on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill H. R. 20095, to establish the Legislative Reference Division of the Library of Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I see that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN], the author of the bill, is not present. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed without prejudice.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] will not object and insist on the bill going off the calendar. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN], who is interested in this bill, as many of us are, unfortunately is not here to-day.

The SPEAKER. It has not been three minutes since he was here.

Mr. BORLAND. The gentleman recollects the bill was——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my request.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be temporarily passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks that the bill be passed temporarily. Is there objection?

Mr. BORLAND. Reserving the right to object, I want to say that this is a bill that will occasion a great deal of debate. There is a pretty widely marked difference of opinion as to the character of the legislative bureau that ought to be created. Under a clause that got into an appropriation bill in another body a year ago, they established this bureau and employed a large number of people and collected a lot of information upon general subjects, such as the advisability of having a budget system, and so on. This is not the kind of legislative bureau that we thought we were going to have, by which Members could have bills redrafted to comply with the decisions of the Attorney General and the courts and Comptroller of the Treasury, but a legislative bureau to go into the investigation of what foreign Governments have done on various matters, such as for rural credits and public health, and so forth.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request that this bill be passed temporarily?

Mr. BORLAND. I object on the ground that it does not properly belong on this calendar and it will occasion a good deal of debate when it comes up.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BORLAND. I object to that, too.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I hope the gentleman will not object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] objects, and the bill is stricken from the calendar.

CLAIMS OF SISSETON AND WAHPETON BANDS OF SIOUX INDIANS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill S. 5255, an act conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear, determine, and render judgment in claims of the Sisseton and Wahpeton Bands of Sioux Indians against the United States.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill be passed without prejudice.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I make the same point of order against that bill that I made against the bill H. R. 14869. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER] made the point that it was not a public bill, which I think is not tenable; but, if it were, it does not alter the case. This is a bill for a claim against the Government. It is a claim against the United States Treasury, and as such, regardless of the character of the claim, it should have gone to the Claims Committee. Now, like the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs [Mr. STEPHENS], I would like to have a ruling on the point of order; and I will ask, if the Speaker is not ready to rule, to have it submitted to him and have him take it under advisement until some future day and give us a ruling.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will do that. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed without prejudice.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Speaker, I think the point of order has precedence over the objection to it. Whenever it comes up it is subject to a point of order, and I make the point of order. I do not ask the Chair to decide it now, but let it be pending.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri will please furnish the Speaker with a brief on all these points. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objects.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I want to state, Mr. Speaker, that this has been a vexed question, and we want it decided one way or the other.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will settle it as soon as he gets a chance to investigate it, but it is an important matter, and as it will probably affect many other bills, he does not wish to settle it offhand. It is as troublesome a bill as there is in the House.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objects, and the bill is stricken from the calendar.

LEGISLATIVE JOURNALS AS SECOND-CLASS MAIL.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 1701) to admit legislative journals of State and Territorial legislatures to the mails as second-class mail matter.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MURDOCK. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to have some explanation as to what extent this is going to increase the free matter. It is penalty matter?

Mr. MADDEN. That bill passed the Senate and was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and Senator BRYAN appeared before the committee and made the statement that a great many requests had been made by officers of the States that permission should be granted to send the journal of the legislatures to the people within the States, not outside the States, without payment of postage.

Mr. MURDOCK. The Post Office Department at the present time is struggling with a deficit that seems to be growing.

Mr. MADDEN. This will not amount to much.

Mr. MURDOCK. There are 48 States in the Union, and some of them have yearly sessions of the legislature, and some have biennial sessions.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. It seems to me that would increase the amount of franked matter considerably.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, if my colleague on the committee will permit, this is not intended to increase the amount of franked matter, but merely to grant to daily legislative journals the second-class mailing privilege. It is not frankable.

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, what are the "daily legislative journals" of the legislative bodies? I know that we have a Journal here, but it is not printed every day.

Mr. MADDEN. Whatever it is, that is what they want.

Mr. MANN. Yes; "whatever it is." I would like to know what it is. It may be a chance to insert all sorts of matter in a legislative journal and send it out under the second-class privilege. The legislative journal is not printed daily.

Mr. MADDEN. In our hearings it was understood that it was merely the journal of the proceedings of the day.

Mr. MANN. Perhaps it is a daily legislative calendar.

Mr. MADDEN. No; it is not a calendar.

Mr. MANN. Certainly the journal of the proceedings is not printed daily in any legislative body on earth.

Mr. MADDEN. If it is not printed daily it would not be sent out daily.

Mr. MURDOCK. Do any legislatures keep a stenographic report of the proceedings?

Mr. MANN. I think not. But it would not be that. We have a legislative Journal here in the House, but it is not printed daily. It is printed some time after the end of a session. I do not think there is any legislative body that prints what we call a journal daily. Now, if this means something, apparently no one knows what it does mean. The sending out of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD is now quite an expense, and if we undertake to allow them to send out everything that is inserted in every legislative body in the States, including all the bills that are introduced and all the reports that are made, the privilege would be used very extensively, possibly, and at considerable cost.

Mr. MADDEN. This is not giving the franking privilege.

Mr. MURDOCK. That was my first impression—that it did give it.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I know; but to send at 1 cent a pound is practically below cost.

Mr. MADDEN. The question is whether the people in the States are not sufficiently interested in the proceedings of the legislatures of the States to justify the enactment of such a law as this.

Mr. MANN. I suspect that if I were in one of the legislative bodies in a State and desired to publish to my constituents the great amount of work that I was doing, I would have the journal showing that I had introduced such and such bills and mail that at 1 cent a pound to all the constituents in my district. It is purely political campaigning that ought to be paid for by the man that does it, and not by the Government of the United States.

Mr. MADDEN. I am not interested in that at all.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] objects.

AMENDMENT OF THE INTERSTATE COMMERCE ACT.

Mr. CULLOP rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Indiana rise?

Mr. CULLOP. I want to call up the bill (H. R. 2496) to amend section 15 of the act to regulate commerce, as amended June 29, 1906, and June 18, 1910. It was called up a few moments ago and objection was made when it was called up, and it was stricken from the calendar. I want to know if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice, and not stricken from the calendar. It is the bill H. R. 2496 to amend section 15 of the Interstate Commerce act. It is No. 368 on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] asks if the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will withdraw his objection made to the consideration of this bill, and let it be passed over without prejudice?

Mr. MANN. So far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to pass over the bill without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] objects.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Pennsylvania withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. MOORE. I have no objection to withholding it.

Mr. CULLOP. This bill passed the Sixty-second Congress by practically a unanimous vote. It is a bill of great importance to the country, for the uniform classification of freights, and I hope that the gentleman will consent that the bill may be passed over now, as objection has been made, without prejudice, so that at some other time it may be taken up during the session. It is a matter of great importance.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] adhere to his objection or does he relent?

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, this is a very important bill, and it is one to which some of the commercial bodies of my section of the country object. I have been hearing from them on this subject. There should be a full discussion of a measure of this importance, and it seems unfair to bring it up in this way on unanimous-consent day when everything is under such high pressure. I would be willing to have it considered in the regular way, but it should not be considered now.

Mr. CULLOP. I want to say to the gentleman, in that connection, that very extensive hearings were had on this bill.

Mr. MOORE. May I ask the gentleman what his request was?

Mr. CULLOP. It was that the bill may now be passed over without prejudice, as objection was made to its consideration.

Mr. MOORE. I do not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

INVESTIGATION AND SETTLEMENT OF ACCOUNTS UNDER RECLAMATION ACTS.

Mr. RAKER rose.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from California rise?

Mr. RAKER. For the purpose of asking unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 124) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to investigate and settle certain accounts under the reclamation acts, and for other purposes, No. 383 on the calendar, be passed over without prejudice. I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to the fact that I have taken this matter up with the department and have had the matter practically looked into, and I ask that it be passed over without prejudice. It has to do with the settlement of accounts under reclamation projects for labor performed.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection. That is the mechanics' lien matter?

Mr. RAKER. Yes.

Mr. STAFFORD. I object to having it returned to.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is trying to prepare a proper bill?

Mr. RAKER. Yes; I am having it put in proper shape, and at the next consideration I will have it in proper shape.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that Calendar No. 383 (H. R. 124) be passed without prejudice. Is there objection?

Mr. MILLER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MILLER. I understand that bill was stricken from the calendar.

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. Will the unanimous consent asked for by the gentleman from California restore it to the calendar; and, if so, to the place it formerly occupied on the calendar?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would; but to be on the safe side the Chair will put the request in this way: The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to pass Calendar No. 383 (H. R. 124) without prejudice and to have it restored to the relative place on the calendar that it now occupies. Is there objection?

Mr. BORLAND. I object.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman let it go to the bottom of the calendar?

Mr. BORLAND. This bill has been on the calendar every time it has been called.

Mr. RAKER. Will not the gentleman let it go to the bottom of the calendar?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. BORLAND. I object.

SANITARY CONDITIONS IN COMPOSING ROOMS, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 18383) to provide better sanitary conditions in composing rooms within the District of Columbia.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all typesetting, type-casting, and similar machines and apparatus, such as linotype machines, monotype casters, stereotype melting pots, and the like, shall be piped in a proper and efficient manner, so as to effectually carry off the noxious fumes and gases arising during their operation: Provided, That exhaust fans, blowers, or other suitable devices shall also be installed when deemed necessary for the purpose of further aiding in the discharge of all deleterious matter from composing and other rooms where any of the above machines may be in operation.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of the health officer of the District of Columbia to inspect the composing rooms of all printing offices within his jurisdiction at least once a year. He shall, in addition to observing that the intent and purpose of this act is carried into effect, order such other changes as he may deem necessary to give proper ventilation to the employees therein. Such orders of the health officer to be complied with within 30 days thereafter. Any failure so to do to be reported by him to the District attorney for prosecution.

SEC. 3. That any person, firm, or corporation found guilty of a violation of, or a failure to comply with, any of the requirements of this act shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, punishable by a fine of $25 for each and every machine so operated: Provided, That each and every day such machine or machines are operated after proper notification by the health officer of the insanitary conditions surrounding them shall be deemed a separate violation and punishable in like manner as the original offense.

SEC. 4. That this act shall take effect three months from the date of its passage.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 1, line 3, after the word "That," insert the words "the melting pots of."

Page 1, line 9, strike out the words "when deemed necessary."

Page 2, strike out all of section 2.

Page 2, line 13, strike out the figure "3" and insert the figure "2."

Page 2, line 17, strike out all of said line after the word "operated" and all of lines 18, 19, 20, and 21 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "; and each day operated shall constitute a separate offense."

Page 2, line 23, strike out the figure "4" and insert in lieu thereof the figure "3."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

THE LATE SENATOR JOHN T. MORGAN.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 196) to authorize the Secretary of War to grant permission to the Southern Commercial Congress to place a tablet at Gamboa, Canal Zone, as a memorial to the late Senator John T. Morgan.

The title of the joint resolution was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, let us have the joint resolution reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That permission is hereby granted for the placing of a tablet containing a portrait bust of the late Senator John T. Morgan, with an appropriate inscription, at Gamboa, in the Canal Zone, at such time and under such regulations as the Secretary of War may direct.

With the following committee amendment:

In line 3, strike out the words "for the placing of" and insert in lieu thereof the words "to the Southern Commercial Congress to place."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I see in the report this statement made concerning Senator Morgan:

It will be universally admitted that but for his persistent, earnest, and able efforts in behalf of the Isthmian Canal there would not be such canal to-day in existence. He was firmly convinced that the Nicaraguan route was the most feasible, but this does not in any way lessen the importance of his efforts, through which, more than anything else, the canal connecting the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans in America was finally constructed and is now in operation.

I assume that as the bill provides the authority to erect a bust on the Panama Canal with an appropriate inscription, those who favor the bill would put on the bust an inscription something like what I have read from the report. I am not willing to admit that that statement in the report is correct. With the highest regard for Senator Morgan and for the work which he did, it is not universally admitted by a long way—that but for his persistent, earnest, and able efforts in behalf of the Isthmian Canal there would not be such a canal to-day in existence.

I do not think it is desirable to give authority to some one to erect an appropriate bust or otherwise with such inscriptions on the canal. If that authority were granted quite generally, we would soon have a large number of these memorial busts along the canal, each claiming that the particular gentleman whose bust was erected was really the author and father of the canal. That would be exceedingly ludicrous.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Illinois has finished what he has to say, I desire to say a word if he will yield the time.

Mr. MANN. I will reserve the right to object. The gentleman can take the floor in his own right.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, it is with very deep regret that I have heard the gentleman from Illinois indicate his intention to object to the consideration of this bill. There is no charge on the Government. The Southern Commercial Congress represents the business interests of the Southern States. John T. Morgan was for more than 30 years a typical representative of those States in the Congress of the United States. He was a man whose character was without question, whose loyalty and earnest devotion to his State and to his country entitled him to a place in history and a place in the hearts of his countrymen. The gentleman from Illinois says it is absurd to say that the work of John T. Morgan was not largely responsible for the building of an Isthmian Canal.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will yield, I did not make any such statement as that.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I thought that was the gentleman's statement.

Mr. MANN. Not at all.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I withdraw it, if I misquoted the gentleman. I did not intend to do so.

Mr. Speaker, I do not hesitate to say that there are several, if not many, great men in this country whose names should be immortal for the work they have done in the building of this canal; but I say that no man has ever been connected with the history of this Government whose work was more continuous and more earnest in behalf of the building of an Isthmian Canal, or the result of whose work was more effective in producing the legislation that ultimately built the canal, than John T. Morgan.

It is true he believed the Nicaragua route was the safest, the best, and the cheapest to be built. When the bill was passed this House, by more than a three-fourths vote, agreed with his position. The House accepted the bill that was finally passed, because it could get no other legislation from the other body.

This gentleman from Iowa, Mr. Hepburn, whose fame will live as long as the canal exists, reported and passed through this House the bill that was advocated by John T. Morgan for building an Isthmian Canal, but it was his insistence that a way should be cut for the passage of the ships through the Isthmus that agitated the American people, that created a sentiment from one coast to the other for the building of this canal. And now I say for the Congress of the United States to deny his own people, who ask nothing of the Government, the right to place a tablet at this canal and record on it the work that he had done in the past connecting the two oceans together in the interest of the commerce and trade of the world, is most unfortunate, and I shall regret most deeply if the distinguished gentleman from Illinois exercises his privilege to defeat this bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I have always had, since I knew anything about him, the greatest admiration for Senator Morgan and for the work which he did in reference to an Isthmian Canal. It is undoubtedly true that his constant effort on the subject had great weight and effect, but it is not correct, in my judgment, to say that but for him there would have been no canal. He was not the only one; he was not the originator at all of the idea that the Government should construct the canal. That is the only way it ever would be constructed. Senator Morgan from the start was insistent upon doing something for the Nicaragua Canal Co., which had a concession. That was the way he thought the canal ought to be constructed. He was strongly in favor of the Nicaragua route and against the Panama route. In that I always agreed with him, and I do yet. But I am unwilling, if I can prevent it, to let some one start in by erecting busts or tablets containing inscriptions along the line of the Panama Canal, claiming that a particular person was the author or the father of the plan.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman will allow me, I know of no intention on the part of the people who intend to erect the tablet to say that he was the father of it. The bill says that they may erect this tablet with a suitable inscription on it, and, of course, that inscription must have the approval of the Secretary of War. I know of no intention on the part of the people to claim that John T. Morgan alone was responsible for building the canal. He undoubtedly is entitled to great credit for the work that he did. He was undoubtedly among the foremost men of those who created a sentiment in the United States for the legislation that was ultimately passed, and I think the gentleman from Illinois is not justified in claiming that these people propose to erect a tablet claiming all the credit for Senator Morgan, because I am sure they do not.

Mr. MANN. I read from the report on this bill, and I have no doubt the report shows the line along which the committee think the proper inscription should be written. Of course, I appreciate the fact that it is highly desirable that the people in Alabama, which State Senator Morgan so long and so ably represented, should believe that he was the one who did the work, and yet there are other points of view without any reflection upon the work that he did do.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have just stated to the gentleman that neither I nor anyone else claim that Senator Morgan did all the work. History and time itself will give him the place that he is entitled to for the great work he did, and I do not think this Congress should withhold the mere privilege from his own people of placing a tablet at the Canal Zone and let future generations know that they believe in the man and the work he did.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to make this suggestion: That the sentiment to be placed on the table or monument, or whatever it may be, should be in the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no objection to that; but I do not propose to advocate a bill which would violate the proprieties of any occasion. As to the Congress dictating who is entitled to the greatest credit, the people of the United States will find that verdict, and nobody in building a monument can find the verdict for them.

Mr. MANN. I suppose if the bill passes it would not be long before we should have a variety of portrait busts, with inscriptions, along the line of the canal that would rival the "Chamber of Horrors" right here behind us.

Mr. DENT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. DENT. I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois, if the objectionable sentence which he read in the report was stricken out by unanimous consent, there being nothing in the bill on this subject, it would relieve his objection to the bill?

Mr. MANN. I think that is the kind of appropriate inscription that the Southern Commercial Congress would think was proper to be placed upon the bust. I do not think that is correct history.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, I might say now, if it will shorten this debate, that I shall object to the consideration of the bill under any circumstances.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Dakota objects, and the bill will be stricken from the calendar.

GRANTING LANDS TO SCHOOL DISTRICT NO. 44, CHELAN COUNTY, WASH.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 4146) granting certain lands to school district No. 44, Chelan County, Wash.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there is hereby granted to school district No. 44, Chelan County, State of Washington, 1.77 acres in lot 3, section 13, township 27 north, range 16 east, Willamette meridian, more particularly described as follows: Beginning at the corner No. 1 of the tract of land to be described, which is a stone marked "S. H.–44," from which the quarter corner between sections 13 and 14, same township, bears north 450 feet, thence south 62 east 418 feet to corner No. 2, thence south 209 feet to corner No. 3, thence north 62 west 418 feet to corner No. 4, thence north 209 feet to corner No. 1, the place of beginning, being the same as now used and occupied by said district for public-school purposes, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to issue patent for said lands to said school district.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MADDEN. Reserving the right to object, I ask that this bill go over without prejudice, as I do not see the author of the bill here.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, will not the gentleman reserve his objection and his request? This only affects 1.7 acres, and the gentleman may not be able to get the bill up again.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the request.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to consider the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

LEASING OF UNPATENTED OIL OR GAS LANDS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 5434) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to grant permits to the occupants of certain unpatented lands on which oil or gas has been discovered, and authorizing the extraction of oil or gas therefrom.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire whether since we embodied this provision in the omnibus bill the Supreme Court or any other court has passed upon the cases which were pending in which these lands were involved?

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that it has not.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will withhold his objection for a moment, until the matter has been considered somewhat.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, several gentlemen seem to desire to discuss the bill, and I reserve the objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, would the gentleman have any objection to the bill going over without prejudice?

Mr. MADDEN. I would not. I would be very glad to agree to that.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, it is rather important that this legislation be enacted at this session of Congress. The session is so near to a close that it is quite certain that general legislation on the subject will not be had; and there are quite a number of cases in California and some in Wyoming that would be affected by this legislation, where relief is needed. The provision is that where a claimant for a patent desires to surrender his right to a patent he may, in lieu of the patent, secure the opportunity to lease not to exceed 640 acres. I do not undertsand why there should be any objection to the passage of the bill. The House has already adopted this provision in the general leasing law.

Mr. MADDEN. Then why do they want this at this time?

Mr. MONDELL. Because the general leasing bill, along with other meritorious legislation, is not very likely to be enacted at this session of Congress. It is now before the Senate, and this is only a fragment of that legislation—an effort to pass a bill that covers those cases that require immediate relief.

Mr. MADDEN. Does not the gentleman think the bill is too important to consider by unanimous consent?

Mr. MONDELL. But the bill has been fully considered by the House and has been approved by the House.

Mr. MADDEN. It will probably have to be considered again at the extra session.

Mr. MONDELL. Not this feature of it, if we provide for it here. It affects only a comparatively few cases; but those cases are important to the industry of the region in which they are located. In my own State, I will say to my friend, we have an oil field whose development just now is very greatly hampered and restricted by reason of the fact that there are some of these entries that are under contest.

Mr. MADDEN. Was the gentleman in favor of this provision in the law, which he said passed the House, for leasing public lands for any purpose?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I offered it as an amendment and it was adopted. That would indicate, I think, that I favored it. There was some discussion in respect to it, and I will ask the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS], if his recollection is the same as mine—that the amended bill as we now have it before us is not in exactly the same language as the amendment adopted to the general leasing bill?

Mr. FERRIS. I think it is identical, and the gentleman from California [Mr. CHURCH] says that it is word for word. I have not compared it myself. The situation is this: We had two relief bills here—one for the relief of some phosphate lands in Idaho, offered by the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH], and this bill that the California and Wyoming people were interested in. By tacit agreement we put both of those bills on the general leasing bill. That bill went to the Senate with these two amendments upon it, and, as the House knows, the Senate is blocked and is not passing anything. Consequently this bill will probably not get through.

Mr. MONDELL. Has not the House since allowed by unanimous consent the passage of the phosphate bill?

Mr. FERRIS. I was just about to add that two weeks ago, perhaps four—in any event on one unanimous-consent day—the Idaho bill for the relief of those parties was brought up by unanimous consent and passed. I expressed the hope at that time, and I express the hope now, that this bill be passed. It does not affect anybody in my State, but all winter long, and for the last year, people from California and Wyoming have journeyed away across the continent at great expense to themselves to urge the Congress to help them out, and I think we will get a chance to get some royalty and some leases out of a very badly mixed-up situation. I think the House ought to do it.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I do; but I have not the floor.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman from Wyoming yield, so that I may ask a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. MADDEN. If this bill is passed, would it not legislate several cases out of the courts?

Mr. FERRIS. No; I think not. The trouble arose over this by reason of making the placer law applicable to oil lands. I never have thought the placer law should be applied to oil; I do not think it fits; and recent developments show that it does not fit. I think this will allow these parties that are trying to get title——

Mr. MANN rose.

Mr. FERRIS. I wish the gentleman would permit me to proceed.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman ought not to proceed too long along that line, because the gentleman is slightly in error.

Mr. FERRIS. What is the error?

Mr. MANN. These cases do not involve a distinction between the placer and the lode mining laws.

Mr. FERRIS. I was not stating that——

Mr. MANN. That is what the gentleman did state.

Mr. FERRIS. No; I was not stating that; I was stating——

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Oklahoma suggests the difficulty arose because we applied the placer law to oil lands. I do not think that is quite accurate; but having applied it, there are certain questions in regard to withdrawals.

Mr. FERRIS. Let me follow up with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN]. This bill merely allows these people to surrender their opportunity to get a patent under that law and take out a lease and pay royalty to the Government. Now, the House, by an almost unanimous vote, committed itself to the proposition last summer that we should get for the Government some royalty out of these oil lands. This will make it uniform; this will allow the Government to get something now where in all probability they will not get it under the other law. The oil people—a great many of them—feel they are losing a good deal by being compelled to take this; but they want to get their fat out of the fire; they want to get their cases tried; they want to get their peace of mind and go ahead with their business.

Mr. MADDEN. Suppose this legislation should be enacted into law, what effect will that have on the litigation now pending?

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman means the litigation in the Land Office?

Mr. MADDEN. In the Supreme Court.

Mr. FERRIS. These cases are pending in the Land Office, which this bill remedies. They are trying to get title to land, but they were held up for one reason or another, and they were held up in getting their patents. They now no longer seek patents but are willing to relinquish and take leases instead of a patent, and this bill gives them the right to do that.

Mr. MADDEN. I think I shall have to object. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and the bill is stricken——

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman consent to this bill being passed without prejudice?

Mr. MADDEN. I am willing to let it go over without prejudice; yes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed without prejudice. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

RIGHT OF WAY FOR PIPE LINE AND RESERVOIR, LINCOLN NATIONAL FOREST.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 2278) granting the El Paso & Rock Island Railway Co. a right of way for its pipe lines and reservoir upon the Lincoln National Forest for the carrying and storage of water for railroad purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as I glean from the report there are some suits pending concerning these water rights now exercised by this railroad company which are being contested by the Government.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Yes; there are some such suits. The bill specially provides that this legislation shall not in any manner affect the merits of this litigation. That provision was put in at the instance of the Department of Justice.

Mr. STAFFORD. Yet it might affect the merits of this litigation. Will not the passage of this bill supersede and obviate the necessity of the further prosecution of that case?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Oh, I do not know that necessarily it would.

Mr. STAFFORD. Is not the very purpose of this bill to grant this railroad company rights which to-day they have not?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. No; that is not the purpose involved. There have been some controversies about pipe lines running across the forest reservation. A permit was issued by the Department of Agriculture, and one of the other departments raised some controversy about it. This is the only pure water the railroad can get for miles and miles, and they have gone to hundreds of thousands of dollars of expense, and they find this water on top of the mountain there, and it is the only water they can use that will run the machinery without being very deleterious and destroying the machinery. The water question is a very important question to-day in that particular section, and this bill was introduced and passed through the Senate so as to eliminate this controversy that had arisen between the departments, and the Government is protected in every way in the world.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman from Texas yield for an inquiry?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Has this railroad company ever attempted to secure this right of way under the act of 1905 that authorizes the use of a right of way for water for domestic purposes?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. As far as I know, that act does not go far enough to embrace railroads.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, it might go far enough to embrace water for the purposes for which a railroad uses water.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. I understand that act covers mining companies and municipalities, and I do not think it extends far enough to give railroads protection.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why has not this bill been submitted to the department for their views?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. It has been so submitted.

Mr. STAFFORD. There is nothing in the report which shows that it has.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. The Secretary of Agriculture's communication was before the committee, and it shows that there is no objection to this legislation. There were quite extensive hearings in the Senate, and in fact the real hearings were had over there.

Mr. STAFFORD. Why was it not embodied in the report, so that Congress might have the views of the department on such a bill?

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. The gentleman will find that information in the hearings before the Senate committee on this same proposition.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman knows that these hearings before the various committees are not easily available to Members. There is no mention here of any such hearings.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. That is true; but quite extended hearings were had, and I will say to the gentleman I took this matter up with representatives from that section of the country who had the bill passed through the Senate. It is purely a local matter to that section of the country, but it is a matter of great importance to this railroad company.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to this bill being passed without prejudice, and in the meantime the gentleman can have a supplemental report in which may be contained the ideas of the department, but where there is litigation on a question which is at issue, and where a bill seeks to overcome the litigation, I think we ought to have the views of the department concerning it.

Mr. YOUNG of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I will ask that the bill be passed without prejudice and that it retain its place on the calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. RAKER). The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that this bill be passed without prejudice and that it retain its place on the calendar. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

COPYRIGHTS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 21137) to amend section 23 of the act entitled "An act to amend and consolidate the acts respecting copyright," approved March 4, 1909.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard. The bill will be stricken from the calendar. The Clerk will report the next bill.

TRADE-MARKS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 16098) revising and amending the statutes relative to trade-marks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I object.

WATER SUPPLY OF NEVADAVILLE, COLO.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 2518) granting to the town of Nevadaville, Colo., the right to purchase certain lands for the protection of water supply.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Reserving the right to object, I would like to inquire why this municipality does not avail itself of the privilege of the general act of February 1, 1905.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. KEATING] is here. He is familiar with these Colorado matters, and will answer questions on the bill. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] is sick in bed, and could not attend the session to-day.

Mr. KEATING. I will say to the gentleman that Nevadaville is a small mining town, and this bill affects only 17 acres.

Mr. STAFFORD. I am aware of that fact.

Mr. KEATING. And that land is needed to protect this water supply.

Mr. STAFFORD. Although the report of the Assistant Secretary says that it affects 17,399 acres, a clear reading of the bill says that it affects only 17 acres.

Mr. KEATING. That is a typographical error. There should be a period inserted after the figures "17" instead of a comma.

Mr. STAFFORD. The bill says it is only 17 acres. The report carries the impression, by reason of the typographical error, that it is 17,399 acres.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. STAFFORD. My original question was, Why does the municipality not avail itself of the privilege under the law of 1905?

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. I suppose this land is included in the forest reserve. The Government has been unwilling to allow them to take any land included in a forest reserve.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under the law of 1905 they are privileged to grant a right of way over and through a forest reserve.

Mr. KEATING. As the officials of the town presented this matter, they insisted it was necessary for them to have a clear title to this tract of land in order that they might put in a water system and issue some bonds.

Mr. STAFFORD. Although my question has not been answered, inasmuch as it involves only a small quantity of land, I will not object.

Mr. KEATING. Thank you.

Mr. MANN. I notice that section 2 says—

That within one year after the survey of the foregoing-described property proposed to be granted to the town of Nevadaville said town may purchase said land by paying the amount prescribed in section 1 hereof, and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to cause the same to be patented to said town.

This property has not yet been surveyed, I believe.

Mr. KEATING. Apparently not.

Mr. MANN. And under this authorization the town is to pay for the survey?

Mr. KEATING. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Suppose it did not put in any money for the next 25 years? The authorization would still stand. Nothing else could be done with the property, and they would have the right within one year after the survey to purchase it. They would practically have purchased it when the bill passed. Now, does not the gentleman think there ought to be some limitation of time in which the survey should be made?

Mr. KEATING. I am perfectly willing to accept any limitation the gentleman suggests, because it is the intention of the town officials to carry out the transaction just as soon as possible.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the town of Nevadaville, a municipal corporation of the State of Colorado, is hereby granted the right to purchase the public lands situate in the county of Clear Creek, Colo., described as follows: Beginning at corner No. 1, from which corner the south one-fourth corner section 32, township 2 south, range 73 west of the sixth principal meridian; bears north 65° 8′ 12″ east 7,227.7 feet; thence south 46° 46′ east 681 feet to corner No. 2; thence south 43° 14′ west 175 feet to corner No. 3, from which corner No. 3 corner No. 1 of survey No. 16,380 bears south 70° 22′ east 223 feet; thence south 46° 23′ east 2,094.97 feet to corner No. 4; thence south 64° 22′ east 730 feet to corner No. 5, from which corner the south one-fourth corner section 32, township 2 south, range 73 west sixth principal meridian, bears north 36° 35′ 21″ east 6,719.17 feet; thence south 52° 55′ west 256 feet to corner No. 6, from which corner No. 6 corner No. 1 of survey No. 19,015 bears south 60° 50′ east 113.6 feet; thence north 61° 18′ 43″ west 675.23 feet to corner No. 7; thence north 44° 59′ west 2,095.1 feet to corner No. 8; thence south 43° 14′ west 175 feet to corner No. 9; thence north 46° 46′ west 681 feet to corner No. 10; thence north 43° 14′ east 500 feet to corner No. 1, the place of beginning; all of said land being situate in unsubdivided township 3 south, range 73 west of the sixth principal meridian (the survey of said land being bounded at its corner with rock monuments chiseled "N1, N2, N3, N4, N5, N6, N7, N8, N9, N10," consecutively), and containing 19.474+ acres, of which 2.075 acres under survey No. 16,380 are in conflict, leaving a total of 17.399 acres, more or less, upon the payment of $1.25 per acre by said town to the United States.

SEC. 2. That within one year after the survey of the foregoing-described property proposed to be granted to the town of Nevadaville, said town may purchase said lands by paying the amounts prescribed in section 1 hereof, and the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed to cause the same to be patented to said town.

SEC. 3. That the grant hereby made is, and the patent issued hereunder shall be, subject to all legal rights heretofore acquired by any person or persons in or to the above described premises, or any part thereof, and now existing under and by virtue of the laws of the United States or of the State of Colorado: Provided, That there is reserved to the United States all gas, oil, coal, and other mineral deposits and the right to prospect for, mine, and remove the same: And provided further, That the cost of the survey, mentioned in section 2 of this act, shall be paid by the said town of Nevadaville: And provided further, That in the event said lands are ever abandoned and not used for municipal purposes all right, title, and interest therein to be conveyed to the said town of Nevadaville by this act shall be forfeited and the same shall revert to the United States.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 22, after the word "Nevadaville," insert the words: "And within two years after the passage of this act."

Mr. MANN. That is in order to save time.

Mr. KEATING. I want to make this suggestion to the gentleman from Illinois. It has just occurred to me that the situation in the Senate is such that I am afraid we will never get the Senate to concur in the proposed amendment on account of the parliamentary situation there. I have absolutely no objection to the amendment. It seems to me the survey would have to be ordered by the Secretary of the Interior, and that he could fix the time when the survey should be made.

Mr. MANN. He can not survey it until the town puts up the money. They might not put up the money under this bill for 50 years.

Mr. KEATING. My only objection is that it might be tied up in the Senate.

Mr. MANN. That applies to so many bills——

Mr. KEATING. But this is such a small matter. However, we will take our chances.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS OF EDUCATION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the House joint resolution 273, requesting the President of the United States to invite foreign Governments to participate in the International Congress on Education.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and requested to invite foreign Governments to appoint honorary vice presidents and otherwise participate in the International Congress on Education, to be held at Oakland, Cal., August 16 to 27, 1915, in connection with the Panama-Pacific International Exposition: Provided, That no appropriation shall be granted at any time hereafter in connection with said congress.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, the Senate joint resolution 187 having passed the Senate, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Foreign Affairs from further consideration of the House joint resolution and take from the Speaker's table Senate joint resolution 187.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California [Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND] asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Foreign Affairs from the further consideration of House joint resolution 273 and consider Senate joint resolution 187 in lieu of the House resolution. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, can the gentleman give us some information in regard to this?

Mr. MANN. This is similar to the resolution which the gentleman from Pennsylvania had in reference to the International Educational Congress to be held at Philadelphia.

Mr. LOGUE. Which was to be held last September, but which was called off on account of the war.

Mr. MOORE. And it is to be held in San Francisco?

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. In Oakland, Cal.

Mr. MOORE. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. CLINE. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from California if this Senate resolution provides for an appropriation?

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. No. It is the identical bill. No appropriation is contained in it.

Mr. MANN. Let us have the Senate joint resolution read, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the Senate joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the President of the United States is hereby authorized and requested to invite foreign Governments to appoint honorary vice presidents and otherwise participate in the International Congress on Education, to be held at Oakland, Cal., August 16 to 27, 1915, in connection with the Panama-Pacific International Exposition: Provided, That no appropriation shall be granted at any time hereafter in connection with said congress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to be recognized for a moment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois for five minutes.

Mr. MANN. No; I am recognized for one hour, but I shall not consume it. Was this International Congress on Education held at Philadelphia?

Mr. MOORE. No; it was not held.

Mr. LOGUE. It was called off on account of the European war.

Mr. MANN. Then all the labor that the two gentlemen from Pennsylvania performed last summer was of no avail and went for naught?

Mr. MOORE. The bill was passed.

Mr. LOGUE. It was called off.

Mr. MANN. A great deal of time was spent on that. Does my friend from California [Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND] understand that it really will be held at Oakland this year?

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. I have been advised by numerous telegrams that the people of Oakland will be, as they always have been, ready for the entertainment of their guests.

Mr. MANN. I understand that there are somewhere between 117 and 170 different conventions and congresses, and so forth, to be held at the Panama-Pacific Exposition during the coming summer. Where will the delegates come from? Certainly the European nations at war will not be sending delegates to this international congress.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Oh, I think there will be some. There will be a good many from the United States, and, I think, some foreigners will be able to attend. All the nations are not at war.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman know whether each one of these congresses is going to ask the Congress to authorize the President to invite representatives of each of the nations of the world to attend each congress at the expense of the delegates and not at the expense of our Government?

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. I think that is specifically stated in the resolution.

Mr. MANN. I know about this one, but I am trying to get information as to the others.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Congress is within 16 days of closing, and I do not think there will be much opportunity afforded for passing other resolutions of this character.

Mr. MANN. Well, as soon as this resolution in the House was restored to the calendar recently, it having been stricken from it by mistake some time ago, I received several communications from different portions of the country in reference to other congresses, with suggestions that other international congresses would also like to have the President invite delegates from foreign countries to attend those congresses. I think the people who sent the letters to me did not know, perhaps, that this resolution provided that the delegates should come at their own expense. Maybe that makes a difference.

Mr. KENT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. KENT. In reference to the gentleman's question as to the possibility of people going there, I received a letter from one of the big universities of California in which the writer stated that he considered this as very important, inasmuch as he expected a great many people to come from Europe.

Mr. MANN. I do not object now to this as it comes toward the end of Congress, and as the gentleman from California [Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND], from the Oakland district, suggests, there is not very much time for all the others to make a request. I never have believed, and do not now believe, in having the Government of the United States invite people to attend something at their own expense.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. I think we did at the Chicago Exposition in 1893.

Mr. MANN. Well, I know that the gentleman does not know, and I myself do not know whether they did or not.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. The report so states.

Mr. MANN. Well, the report was written by a gentleman who did not know. I think the Government entertained quite a good many people at the Chicago Exposition, invited from abroad; and if the gentleman has any doubt about that, I will refer him to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. TOWNSEND], who, in one of his "Chimmie Fadden" articles positively asserts, in a very humorous manner, that that was the case.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate joint resolution.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that House joint resolution 273 be again stricken from the calendar and laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next one.

GRANT OF CERTAIN LANDS TO GRAND JUNCTION, COLO.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 19116) to grant certain lands to the city of Grand Junction, Colo., for the protection of its water supply.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, let us have the bill reported.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to convey to the city of Grand Junction, in the county of Mesa and State of Colorado, section 34, township 12 south, range 97 west of the sixth principal meridian, in said county and State, to have and to hold said lands for the purpose of the protection of the head gate of the water-supply pipe lines and waterworks system of said city: Provided, That the said city of Grand Junction shall pay for said lands or such portions thereof as it may need for said purpose at the rate of $1.25 per acre: And provided further, That the grant hereby made is, and patent issued thereunder shall be, subject to all legal rights heretofore acquired by any person or persons in or to the above-described premises or any part thereof and now existing under and by virtue of the laws of the United States.

With a committee amendment, adding the following proviso:

Page 2, line 4, change the period to a colon and add the following: Provided, That there shall be reserved to the United States all oil, coal, and other mineral deposits that may be found in the lands so granted, and all necessary use of the lands for extracting the same: Provided further, That the lands hereby authorized to be purchased as hereinbefore set forth, and all portions thereof, shall be held and used by or for the said grantee for the purpose herein specified, and in the event the said lands shall cease to be so used they shall revert to the United States, and this condition shall be expressed in the patent to be issued under the terms of this act: And provided further, That the grant herein contained shall not be construed to deprive the public the right to continue the use of what is known as the Kannah Creek trail across said land.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, the bill is on the Union Calendar. I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MANN. I object. I have some amendments to offer.

Mr. FERRIS. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 19116, objection having been made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union?

Mr. MANN. I objected. A motion is pending.

Mr. FERRIS. I made the motion, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill H. R. 19116. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] will take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 19116, with Mr. FOSTER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. It was read a moment ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman explain this bill a little more fully?

Mr. FERRIS. I will give the gentleman the explanation that I have. It simply authorizes the city of Grand Junction to buy 640 acres of unoccupied, rough, hilly land at $1.25 an acre, the usual Government price, for the purpose of protecting the water supply of the city. The bill was referred to the department, and the department made a favorable report on it, and the committee made a unanimous report. I will say, parenthetically, that the author of the bill is sick to-day and is not here.

Mr. MANN. That is one reason why we did not object to the consideration of it. If he had been here he would have excited opposition.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SELDOMRIDGE] is here, however, and he can perhaps respond to any question the gentleman may wish to ask.

Mr. MANN. I do not care especially to ask the gentleman from Colorado about the bill. I should like to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma. We have passed so many of these bills, I should like to ask the gentleman is there no way under which the town can make a purchase of Government land?

Mr. FERRIS. Under the act of 1905 they can procure rights of way, but there is no general act under which they can buy land for watershed purposes, and each case has to stand on its own bottom apparently. Some one raised that question in the committee a short time ago, and suggested that we ought to pass a general act. It was our thought that the calendars were congested with about 400 bills and that a bill of that kind would probably provoke discussion and debate, and we felt unwilling to bring that up in the House.

Mr. MANN. Could not anybody take possession of the land?

Mr. FERRIS. Anybody could enter it if he wanted to. It is open to homestead entry.

Mr. MANN. How could an individual obtain it under existing law?

Mr. FERRIS. If the gentleman from Illinois and myself were clothed with homestead qualifications, we could go out and homestead the land and acquire title to it, and then probably hold the city up afterwards.

Mr. MANN. It is unfair to make that statement. Neither the gentleman from Oklahoma nor myself would hold up the city. Other people might do it. We are exempt from such a charge.

Mr. FERRIS. I was merely using the gentleman from Illinois and myself for an illustration, for the moment.

Mr. MANN. I might hold up the city, but I am sure the gentleman from Oklahoma would not.

Mr. FERRIS. I bow in reverence to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. There are a great many who would attempt it, of course.

Mr. FERRIS. That is true.

Mr. MANN. Is there no other way of obtaining title to this land except by homestead entry?

Mr. FERRIS. If this was desert land they could make a desert entry on it and then buy it, but in order to do that they would have to show that it was irrigable, and then put water on it.

Mr. MANN. Can you not obtain desert land until you can show that it is irrigable?

Mr. FERRIS. No; and you actually have got to put the water on it before you can get it.

Mr. MANN. They could put water on it, I suppose. That is what this is for, to maintain the water supply, or a water reservoir. There is a water pipe that will run through it, is there not?

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman knows that the rainfall is very slight up there, and they must have a large area to catch the snow that falls in the winter. I know that the House has been to the trouble of considering a good many bills of this kind, and no doubt it is annoying to the gentleman from Illinois to have them come up continually.

Mr. MANN. I will say that nothing in the way of legislation ever annoys me. I take it as it comes.

Mr. FERRIS. The thought I was trying to leave was this, that these lands have no value for homestead purposes. They have no value as desert-land claims. They have no value for anything on earth, as I believe, other than they may have some mineral under them, or that they may be used to protect the watersheds of these cities, so that they may have pure water.

Mr. MANN. As I understand, this bill is for the purpose of retaining this land as a watershed, to furnish pure water to this city.

Mr. FERRIS. I so understand.

Mr. MANN. And yet it contains a provision that a trail shall continue across the land for the purpose of having cattle travel over it. It does not seem to me that would be very appropriate for a 640-acre watershed, to leave it so that the ranchmen in that country could run their cattle over it. That would not be my idea of pure water.

Mr. FERRIS. I confess there is very much force in what the gentleman says. Still it is better to have one road across it than it would be to have people camp on it and hold their cattle on it overnight. The report also states that they have a caretaker. The city of Grand Junction is under the commission form of government, and it has a caretaker who can look after it without additional expense. While the gentleman from Colorado could tell better than I, it is probably some old trail that they would have trouble about if they should close it up. There are many mountain passes up there that must be preserved. I think they can handle a local matter of that kind. It is worthless land. They want it; they need it. Pure water is always important.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. While I am not personally acquainted with the land in question, I know that Grand Junction has constructed its waterworks at some distance from the city, and these lands are evidently located several miles, perhaps 10 or 15 miles, away from the city. The trail probably leads up through the canyon to a place otherwise inaccessible, so that it is necessary to preserve this convenient means of travel to the section of country that is reached by it. The purpose of getting the land, as I understand it, is to furnish protection to the water supply and allow the city to exercise police power over the land.

Mr. MANN. I can not understand how it will furnish protection to the water supply to have 640 acres of land, over which there is a cattle trail, where large numbers of cattle are constantly passing. That is to me a queer idea.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Probably the city does not want to interfere with the only route of travel that exists.

Mr. MANN. I suspect that the city does want to interfere.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. The bill will leave the trail open.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but that is one objection to the bill. What sense is there in giving to a city the right to 640 acres of land for the purpose of letting it have pure water and at the same time provide for a cattle trail over it?

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. It is not exactly a cattle trail.

Mr. MANN. I imagine it is for the purpose of accommodating some private persons.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. The gentleman would not want to discontinue the only possible route for travel in going into the mountains with pack animals, would he? This trail would bear the same relation as a public road in a narrow canyon.

Mr. MANN. If there could not be a trail put anywhere else, the gentleman's remarks would be fully appropriate; but that is what I want to know.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. I think that is the condition.

Mr. MANN. The bill as introduced did not provide for any such exemption. I suppose somewhere some stockman kicks because he does not want to go around half a mile farther with his stock. I should say that the protection of the water supply of a city like Grand Junction was of more importance than the convenience of some stockman.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Has the gentleman read the report?

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; I have read the report.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. FERRIS. I know the gentleman is always right, and he probably has his powder dry in this instance; but where did the gentleman get the idea that this is cattle trail?

Mr. MANN. The report on page 2 says:

> It appears to your committee that for some 25 years past certain stockmen and ranchmen have constructed and used a trail extending from the valley below up to the highlands beyond and across a portion of this land.

Mr. FERRIS. That is sufficient.

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask one further question. I suppose it is the intention, probably, of the city to purchase the entire 640 acres, but the bill provides—

> That the said city of Grand Junction shall pay for said lands, or such portions thereof as it may need for said purpose, at the rate of $1.25 per acre.

Should they not pay for the entire 640 acres within some limit of time?

Mr. FERRIS. I think so. I do not know whether the land has been surveyed or not.

Mr. MANN. It must have been surveyed or they could not describe it as section 34, township 12 south, range 97 west of the sixth principal meridian.

Mr. FERRIS. I do not know what the facts are about that, but if the gentleman has an amendment he wishes to offer I do not think the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] would object to it.

Mr. MANN. I expect to offer an amendment striking out, commencing in line 11, page 1, the words "or such portions thereof as it may need for said purpose," and then insert after the word "shall," line 11, the words "within [stating the time] from the passage of this act."

Mr. FERRIS. I feel sure that there will be no objection to that.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, this legislation should be had. It is regrettable that we have not some general legislation on this subject. As I understand it, the Committee on the Public Lands has had under consideration for some time general legislation on the subject. I think such a bill was reported out at one time, but for some reason or other it was not passed.

Mr. Chairman, I feel like protesting against the restrictions we place around transfers to municipalities of land of the character of this description. This tract, as I understand, is very rough, mountainous land, through which a deep canyon runs. It has a little brush on it and, probably, is not worth more than the price fixed—$1.25 an acre—if it is worth that. It has never been considered valuable enough to tempt anyone to homestead it. The probability is that no portion of it is fit for cultivation; it is just a scrubby, brushy canyon-cut mountainside. We are selling it to a municipality, to a collection of American citizens who are going to hold it in their collective capacity, and yet we throw as many restrictions about it as if we were proposing to sell it to some grasping corporation that we thought was going to utilize it for the purpose of holding up the community.

We first provide that if, perchance, any minerals shall be found they shall be reserved to the United States. Now, in all probability the land does not contain any minerals. I assume that no one has ever suggested that it contains minerals. So this reservation is entirely superfluous; but it has this effect: We are granting land which is to be used for the protection of the water supply, in order that the city may keep trespassers off the tract and protect it, to prevent pollution of the water supply, and we place in the law a provision which invites trespassers, invites evil-intentioned persons to go on the tract ostensibly for prospecting after any or every sort of mineral, going up there and camping under pretense of prospecting, and liable to commit all sorts of depredations under the pretext of prospecting, if they are so disposed.

If we were disposing of this land to an individual, there might be some excuse for this mineral reservation. As a matter of fact, there is probably no excuse for mineral reservation even in such a case, because the lands contain no minerals, as far as anybody knows. The geological formation is such that there is not the remotest probability of any mineral being found under the surface. But dealing with American citizens collectively, a municipality, for the purpose of enabling them to protect their water supply, we insist on reserving all kinds and sorts of minerals, as though they actually might sometime be found, and by so doing we invite every person who in good faith may seek to prospect, every blackmailer, every person who for any reason might desire to go on the lands under pretense that they were prospecting, to interfere with the protection of the water supply.

Then, although the land is worthless, simply a square mile serving to hold the surface of the earth together, made up of brush, canyon, and rock of no value—nobody wants it, nobody has homesteaded it—if the city shall not use it for these particular purposes we propose to take it back, not that we have any use for it, not that we know that anyone will ever want it or desire it or have any particular reason for utilizing it, but if the city shall not use it for this particular purpose, for the protection of its water supply, we propose to take it back. We throw around a grant of this kind—of rocky, brushy hillside—more regulations and provisions which may be harmful, in disposing of it to a community in its community capacity, than would be necessary were we disposing of something that really might become very valuable to some grasping corporation that might use the values for the purpose of holding up the community.

Mr. Chairman, I realize that the gentlemen on the Committee on the Public Lands understand that only by inserting all of these reservations and provisions with regard to the extinguishment of the title for nonuse can legislation of this kind be gotten through the House. I presume they are probably correct in their view of the matter. It seems to me that we have arrived at a peculiar state of mind in the House when it is necessary to have all of these conditions and limitations surrounding the transfer from all of the people to part of the people of a tract of rocky, barren, practically worthless hill land.

Mr. STAFFORD rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire to be recognized in his own right?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do.

Mr. FERRIS. How long does the gentleman desire?

Mr. STAFFORD. I do not intend to consume very much time.

Mr. FERRIS. I desired to ask unanimous consent to close the general debate.

Mr. STAFFORD. I think the gentleman will get it closed more quickly by having me proceed now.

Mr. FERRIS. Very well.

Mr. STAFFORD. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee the reason why they embodied the following proviso:

And provided further, That the grant herein contained shall not be construed to deprive the public the right to continue the use of what is known as the Kannah Creek trail across said land.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I do not know what the trail is, I do not know how important it is, and I do not know why it was suggested. It was suggested by the department, and it was in obedience to their suggestion that we reserved it. The information is that the city has a caretaker who lives on the land and can protect these watersheds. I presume it is a mountain pass or something that could not well be closed, although that is an assumption upon my part.

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman is in error when he states that it was suggested or recommended by the department. I direct his attention to the letter of the Secretary of the Interior, as found on page 2 of the report, wherein the Secretary makes some suggestions, but in those suggestions nothing is contained as to this reservation of the rights to this trail. Some person outside, other than the Secretary, and outside of the department, has made that suggestion.

Mr. FERRIS. Perhaps the gentleman is right. The department made the suggestion with reference to the mineral reservation; and as I look at it again I think the gentleman is right. There are two provisos there, and it was my thought that the committee copied them verbatim; but it seems the gentleman is right. The mineral reservations were suggested by the department and the committee adopted them.

Mr. STAFFORD. The committee adopted the recommendations of the department, but added another proviso for which it is difficult to find any suggestion, so far as the department is concerned.

Mr. FERRIS. It is unfortunate that the author of the bill who knows about this is sick and unable to be here to-day.

Mr. STAFFORD. It is a minor matter, and I presume it does not impair the general provisions of the bill. I will not press the inquiry further. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Oklahoma if the city of Grand Junction is now using this lease of land for the purpose denominated in the bill, and if so, how long have they been so using it?

Mr. FERRIS. They are really not using it at all. It has been vacant land, and they desire to use it as a part of their watershed.

Mr. FOWLER. Have they ever used it for the purpose of a watershed to supply the city with water?

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, no. They do not own it. It is public land. Anybody could, if they desire, go upon it and enter it.

Mr. FOWLER. They may have been using the water from it even though it is public land.

Mr. FERRIS. I presume they have, inadvertently.

Mr. FOWLER. It has occurred to me that they might want to get across that particular tract of land to a more desirable tract of land for the purpose of supplying the city with water.

Mr. FERRIS. That may be true. The House is unfortunate in not having the exact information at hand regarding this trail.

Mr. FOWLER. The reason I am led to that conclusion is because the sanitary conditions of the tract of land are not very well preserved by the bill, and it occurred to me that perhaps the city did not want the land for the purpose of the watershed to furnish water, but as a right of way over which they might go to a more desirable fountain of water supply.

Mr. FERRIS. They have the power to get the right of way under another act, without coming to Congress, so that I believe the gentleman's presumption would hardly be correct. An act was passed in 1905 authorizing cities to get rights of way without coming to Congress. So it could not be for that purpose.

Mr. FOWLER. It is not very clear in the bill, and no information has been given which is clear, as to the real intent of the purchase of this land by the city.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman is in error in that. The bill and the report are clear on those points, but we are unfortunate in not being able to tell the gentleman about this road, and the committee has gladly confessed that inability to the gentleman and to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. STAFFORD], owing to the absence of the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR].

Mr. FOWLER. The conflict between the high purpose which is urged for the purchase of this land and the promiscuous use permitted by the bill which might defeat that high purpose is of such a character that it does not appear to Members who are not acquainted with conditions there that it is the real purpose to use this land for a watershed.

Mr. FERRIS. About that there can be no question. The city needs this as a part of their watershed. They have asked for it. The city council has asked for it and the officials of the city who have appeared before us asked for it. This road matter is the only part of the bill I am not familiar with. I assume it is some local matter, some mountain pass or something of that kind, and if the gentleman feels it is wrong or has any doubt about the matter he can move to strike it out when the time arrives.

Mr. FOWLER. I shall not do so, because I feel the committee knows more about it than I do. I know nothing whatever about this, although I have been to Grand Junction and I know something about the surroundings there, and it appears to me that the practical effect the bill pretends to seek is not very clearly defined.

Mr. Chairman, I do not agree with my colleague from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] in his remarks concerning the disposition of real estate. Apparently he objects to the limitations surrounding this purchase, or proposed purchase, by the city of Grand Junction. It never was intended by the wonderful God of all that any one man or any set of men should get a monopoly of what is known to be the greatest physical inheritance that men ever had. The right of a man to have a home ought to be preserved in the State; the State has title to the land in republics, the king in absolute forms of government. The State ought to see that the real estate shall never be hedged about by the control of the few against the rights of the many, and if a State has permitted such to be done it becomes the solemn duty of the State to remedy such wrongs and see that the real estate is held for homesteads for the poor. To do otherwise——

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOWLER. In a moment—to do otherwise is a violation of the divine gift from heaven to man. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. I agree with what the gentleman has said——

Mr. FOWLER. I only yielded for a question.

Mr. MONDELL. And much admire his eloquence, but there is no reservation here of a homestead right. So far as homestead rights are concerned, they are wiped out and obliterated by this legislation. There is a reservation here in the United States as against the good people of Grand Junction to minerals that are not there.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wyoming has lost sight of the necessity for preserving real estate for homes, instead of allowing it to go into the hands of corporations. Municipal corporations have no more right to acquire large areas of land and hold them in deference to the rights of individuals than private corporations have. One of the greatest acts that was done by Napoleon was the division of the real estate of France into small tracts and placing them within easy reach of the French peasants. That was one of the great reasons why France was able to pay the wonderful indemnity in 1872 imposed on her by Germany.

Mr. McKENZIE. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. FOWLER. In a moment. The gentleman from Wyoming objects to this land going back to the United States in case the city of Grand Junction should cease to use it for a watershed supply. What could be more sensible than to let it go back to the real owner? What does Grand Junction want with it now except to keep the people supplied, according to the terms of this bill, with water, and as soon as that necessity has ceased, then the real estate ought to go back where it came from, to the State, to be held for the purpose of use in the future, whether for mineral purposes, homestead, or otherwise. Real estate ought not to be perpetuated in large tracts in the hands of the few. Corporations ought not to be permitted to hold real estate except for the purpose of their business; manufacturing industries may own the ground on which their plants rest; banking institutions may hold the ground on which their business buildings rest; but no country will ever be prosperous which permits the few to gobble up the real estate and hold it against the rights of the many. I now yield to my colleague from Illinois.

Mr. McKENZIE. I understand this bill is for the purpose of granting certain lands to the municipality of Grand Junction for the protection of its water supply. I desire to ask my colleague if he does not believe it is perfectly proper for municipalities to control tracts of land, even large tracts of land, for park purposes and for the protection of a water supply, and if the control of the same does not inure to the interests of the people.

Mr. FOWLER. Oh, certainly; that is true. Municipalities ought to have an opportunity to see that sanitary conditions prevail within their limits, and that is always desirable; but it is never desirable to hold large tracts of land against the interest of individuals so as to deprive them of homesteads. The happiest place in the world is the place which a man can call his home. [Applause.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. STOUT having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had concurred in the request of the House of Representatives for the return of the enrolled bill (S. 7555) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Suwanee River, in the State of Florida.

GRANT OF CERTAIN LANDS TO GRAND JUNCTION, COLO.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the committee amendment by inserting, in line 18, after the word "public," the word "of."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the committee amendment by inserting after the word "Public," in line 18, the word "of."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The question was taken, and the committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move, page 1, line 11, after the word "shall," to insert the words "at least two years from the passage of this act."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, on page 1, by inserting after the word "shall," in line 11, the words "within two years after the passage of this act."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Now, I move to strike out, commencing with line 11, the language "or such portions thereof as it may need for said purpose."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 11, after the word "lands," strike out the words "or such portions thereof as it may need for said purpose."

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, let me make a suggestion to the gentleman on that. I can think of a case where there might be some objection to adopting that. Suppose that only half the land fell into the watershed at all, and the other half carried the water off in another direction, does the gentleman think, then, that the land ought not to be used for its proper purpose on the other side; that is, mining, or grazing, or such other uses as it might be put to, and not compel the city to buy something to hold in idleness—something it did not want?

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman's supposition was correct, the criticism would be correct. The statement, however, is, that this land is valueless so far as its use for anything else is concerned. They take the water from Kannah Creek and on this section they have what is called a head gate. This is some distance from the city, and there the water pipe starts and carries the water to the city of Grand Junction. Well, I doubt whether any of this section can be used if the city should just get the land right around the head gate. Now, they say they want to buy it all. I am willing to sell it all to them, but I doubt whether it would be fair to the Government and the rest of the land to sell just a little bit of it right around the head gate and right along the line of the creek.

Mr. FERRIS. I can see how that would work an unfairness. I only thought of a supposititious case.

Mr. MANN. They stated they wanted to purchase the whole section. There are no adverse rights.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill favorably.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FOSTER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 19116) to grant certain lands in the city of Grand Junction, Colo., for the protection of its water supply, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with certain amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FERRIS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

UNAPPROPRIATED LANDS IN NORTH DAKOTA.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a concurrent resolution adopted by the Legislative Assembly of the State of North Dakota, pertaining to legislation for the purpose of assisting in settling up unappropriated lands in North Dakota and the West.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Dakota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by publishing certain resolutions of the North Dakota Legislature in reference to settling up the wild lands there. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the joint resolution:

STATE OF NORTH DAKOTA,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

I, Thomas Hall, Secretary of State of the State of North Dakota and keeper of the great seal thereof, hereby certify that the attached is a true and correct copy of a certain concurrent resolution adopted by the Fourteenth Legislative Assembly of the State of North Dakota and the whole of such resolution.

In testimony whereof I have hereunto set my hand and affixed the great seal of the State at the capitol, in the city of Bismarck, this 10th day of February, A. D. 1915.

[SEAL.] THOMAS HALL, Secretary of State.

A concurrent resolution (McClellan).

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of North Dakota (the Senate concurring), That—

Whereas there are now in the western part of North Dakota about 673,000 acres of rough, broken, and nonirrigable vacant Government land more suitable for grazing and stock raising than for any other purpose; and

Whereas the steady development of the West has been dependent upon and built up by actual settlers and homesteaders who came west for the purpose of finding homes for the support and maintenance of themselves and families; and

Whereas the occupation and settlement of these vacant lands will in time, through taxation and other sources, inure to the benefit of the counties and whole country in which said lands are located; and

Whereas practically all the agricultural lands in the third congressional district of the State of North Dakota have been selected and are now occupied by actual settlers; and

Whereas the balance of the unoccupied lands are quite rough and broken and consists mostly of what are commonly known as the Bad Lands and principally valuable for stock raising; and

Whereas there is a shortage of beef throughout the land as a result of stock raising having been neglected for agricultural pursuits; and

Whereas the balance of this land, if assigned in proper quantities, will yet support hundreds of families; and

Whereas we believe an act can and should be passed by Congress which will grant each settler a sufficient acreage of said lands as will comfortably support a family by mixed farming and stock raising thereon, and which act might be drafted along the line of the 640-acre stock-raising homestead bill No. 15799, which was introduced during the second session of the Sixty-third Congress of the United States, and in which there is incorporated a classification clause which would leave absolutely no grounds for the act to monopolize lands coming under the 160-acre or 320-acre acts; and

Whereas it has come to our notice that a movement was no foot to have Congress pass a law to have said Government lands granted to the State for leasing purposes, and to also pass a national leasehold bill; and

Whereas we believe that such an act would be a crime and an outrage perpetrated upon the counties in which said lands are situated and would deprive them of the actual settlers and families which they would otherwise get, and would further deprive such counties of the assessable valuations and taxable property which they are entitled to and from which said counties would eventually realize an abundance of revenues by virtue of entrymen having their lands patented and homes built thereon for themselves and families and their children's children; and

Whereas there is not the incentive for families to build up valuable and permanent homes on rented land that there is on land they can call their own, and from which they would not have to be separated by virtue of the expiration of a lease; and

Whereas there are a number of the counties in which this land is located that are already too small in the area of their agricultural lands without robbing them of what is left, and this is especially true of Billings County, which has not any more taxable real estate than it needs for the running of their county government; and

Whereas we do not believe in heaping the burdens of taxation on the few who happen to own the agricultural land in such localities when the same can be reduced with the settlement of these vacant Government lands by homesteaders who are willing to share the burden of taxation in their community for the purpose of getting homes; and

Whereas we are heartily in favor of some act that will tend to improve said district and bring settlers who will make permanent homes therein, but that we are bitterly opposed to the submission of a national leasehold bill or any act that will shut the lands out from actual homesteading, thereby curtailing and handicapping the development and upbuilding of said district: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of North Dakota (the Senate concurring), That we transmit a copy of this resolution to our Senators and Representatives in the National Congress, requesting and urging them to use all honorable means to see that the spirit of this resolution be put into execution as far as possible, and that any act which would tend to prevent the actual settlement of the lands above referred to, and which would deprive any county in said third congressional district of the full benefit of its lands through taxation or otherwise, be prevented.

It is further resolved, That the secretary of state is hereby authorized to transmit the foregoing resolution to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of North Dakota.

A. P. HANSON,
Speaker of the House.
ALBERT N. WOLD,
Chief Clerk of the House.
J. H. FRAINE,
President of the Senate.
M. J. GEORGE,
Secretary of the Senate.

VESSELS FOR COAST AND GEODETIC SURVEY.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 20418) to authorize the purchase or construction of six new vessels, with all necessary equipment, for the Coast and Geodetic Survey, and providing for additional survey by the Coast and Geodetic Survey.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, is my friend from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] serious about this?

Mr. ADAMSON. I suppose so. I have not cracked a smile about it lately. I would like to have the bill passed.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows that in the sundry civil bill there escaped me, unfortunately, while I was detained by some one else in conversation, a provision for two new vessels, to cost $290,000, for this service. That probably will get into the law, although it ought to have been stricken out on a point of order.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am very much obliged to the Committee on Appropriations for granting that much. And if those are really intended as a part of this authorization, I am willing to give credit for them when they go to appropriate for these.

Mr. MANN. Those two having been carried in the appropriation bill, where they will probably be provided for, and assuming that was satisfactory to the department, I did not suppose the gentleman would be pressing a bill now for six.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am not advised that those two are a part of this authorization at all.

Mr. MANN. That was what I was trying to get at, whether the new Department of Commerce, with a view to economy in its efforts to restrict expenditures—and we all know how hard it is working in that direction—wanted to build eight new vessels this year, or only six, or only two.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have always voiced my protest against using economy on the small matters from my committee only, and letting extravagance run wild on other things. If gentlemen would use it on the large matters that come in in millions, on the large propositions, it seems to me, with less hurt to any of them, we would do a great deal on the side of saving, and still grant the little authorizations from my committee.

Mr. MANN. I vote for economy on the large measures. I am not sure that my friend always does.

Mr. ADAMSON. Oh, yes.

Mr. MANN. I have in every case. I notice the half-million dollar items mount up if there are enough of them.

Mr. ADAMSON. There are not many. Our committee has jurisdiction of a few things that go to the vitals of the Government's operations and transactions, and when we come in with a bill for a few little necessary appliances and facilities to carry on the necessary work of the Government, it strikes some of the gentlemen very hard—I do not allude to the gentleman from Illinois; he is not the worst one—and yet they can swallow without choking hundreds of millions of dollars that do not go for any such beneficial purposes.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will have an opportunity to-morrow, or soon, to show whether he is in favor of economy on large measures or not. I am in favor of economy on both the large and small measures.

Mr. ADAMSON. I thank the gentleman for his suggestion, and, inasmuch as he has mentioned it, I am sure he has reference to the administration ship bill. If I do have a chance to vote for it, I shall vote for it with the greatest of pleasure, as the most necessary thing to be done that has come before the House in a generation, because the business of the world is paralyzed, we are without shipping to do our business, and our products here at home are wasting. We are not able to secure their transportation, and if we do not provide transportation for them at once our people will lose the benefit of them and also lose an opportunity to capture the trade of the world. [Applause.] That bill ought to pass, and pass quickly.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CLINE. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana objects, and the bill will be stricken from the calendar. The Clerk will report the next bill.

PREVENTION OF LEPROSY IN THE UNITED STATES.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 20040) to provide for the care and treatment of persons afflicted with leprosy and to prevent the spread of leprosy in the United States.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, let us have the bill reported.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to select and obtain, by purchase or otherwise, a site or sites suitable for the establishment of a home or homes for the care and treatment of persons afflicted with leprosy, to be administered by the United States Public Health Service; and the Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of the Interior, or the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to transfer to the Secretary of the Treasury any abandoned military, naval, or other reservation suitable for the purpose, or as much thereof as may be necessary, with all buildings and improvements thereon, to be used for the purpose of said home or homes.

SEC. 2. That there shall be received into said home or homes, under regulations prepared by the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, any person afflicted with leprosy who presents himself or herself for care, detention, and treatment, or who may be apprehended under authority of the United States quarantine acts, or any person afflicted with leprosy duly consigned to said home or any of said homes by the proper health authorities of any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia. The Surgeon General of the Public Health Service is authorized, upon request of said authorities, to send for any person afflicted with leprosy within their respective jurisdictions, and to convey said person to any such home for detention and treatment, and when the transportation of any such person is undertaken for the protection of the public health, the expense of such removal shall be paid from funds set aside for the maintenance of said home or homes.

SEC. 3. That regulations shall be prepared by the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, for the government and administration of said home or homes and for the apprehension, detention, treatment, and release of all persons who are inmates thereof.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause the erection upon such site or sites of suitable and necessary buildings for the purposes of this act at a cost not to exceed the sum herein appropriated for such purpose.

SEC. 5. That when any commissioned or other officer of the Public Health Service is detailed for duty at the home or homes herein provided for he shall receive, in addition to the pay and allowances of his grade, one-half the pay of said grade and such allowances as may be provided by the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 6. That for the purposes of carrying out the provisions of this act there is hereby appropriated, from any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $250,000, or as much thereof as may be necessary, for the preparation of said home or homes, including the erection of necessary buildings, the maintenance of the patients, pay and maintenance of necessary officers and employees, until June 30, 1916.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, where are these homes to be located?

Mr. ADAMSON. That has not been determined. I will state to the gentleman that the only suggestion I have heard about it is that two or three States are now maintaining homes of that kind—one in Louisiana, and one in Massachusetts, and one in some other State—and the supposition is that these States will be glad to turn over those homes to the Government.

Mr. MANN. And have the Government support them instead of the States?

Mr. ADAMSON. Yes; just as the Government did with respect to the quarantine stations.

Mr. MANN. Well, why not have the Government support all other State eleemosynary institutions?

Mr. ADAMSON. Well, I suppose the fundamental questions involved it is unnecessary for us to discuss at length just now. It is a practical proposition, and not a theory. The country is filling up with lepers, and they go about from State to State, and it has gotten so that we have about 4,000 lepers in the United States. The Government should protect interstate commerce and health by removing the menace to travel and by taking care of these people.

Mr. MANN. Do I understand that it is the purpose of the department now to have a leprosorium in Massachusetts?

Mr. ADAMSON. No; they have not said that. I said that Massachusetts has a leprosorium, and Louisiana has a leprosorium, and some other State, possibly California, has one, and it has been suggested to us that those homes might be acquired. It is objectionable, of course, in some communities for the Government to establish a leprosorium in their vicinity, but wherever they already exist and are maintained by the State authorities and can be sold to the Government, I think all friction in that respect could be removed.

Mr. MANN. This matter has been under consideration by the committee, which undoubtedly has had hearings upon it. How many leprosoriums is it intended to have under the provisions of this bill? There is no limit placed in the bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. No; there is no limit in the bill, but it is not intended to have many. One proposition was to acquire an island somewhere off the coast and to have just one. I do not know what will be determined upon about that.

Mr. MANN. This bill authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to buy a site at any place in the United States for a leprosorium, wherever he chooses.

Mr. ADAMSON. I would take it for granted, however, that he would not do so over the objections of the community, and the easiest way would be to purchase or acquire those already established in the States.

Mr. MANN. I take it that if he does it, it will be over the objections of the immediate community. They certainly will never consent. The bill also authorizes practically all the departments to turn over at any time any land which they have in the way of a reservation.

Mr. ADAMSON. Well, it might be that a reservation would be found suitable for it free from objection, where the Government could allow it to be constructed. We can not, of course, settle all these details in advance. One of the best reasons why we can not is the one suggested by the gentleman, that if we were to propose to locate one at a particular place the people around that place would do to us just as they did before, when we proposed to locate one in Arizona. They defeated the entire bill, because the people interested in that country did not want it.

Mr. MANN. I remember that very well. I have no objection, I will say to the gentleman, to giving the Public Health Service authority to locate a leprosorium and take the chances on where it will be located, but I am very much opposed to giving them authority to locate 40.

Mr. ADAMSON. So am I.

Mr. MANN. This gives them that authority, without any limit at all, practically to take any piece of land that the Government owns and to buy any piece they choose.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not suppose they would establish one where it was unnecessary or force one on an unwilling community. I believe they would work it out with more common sense than that.

Mr. MANN. I do not always assume that a department will exercise all the power it can; but whenever we give them unlimited authority we find that they do exercise it, just the same, and they say, "There is the law."

Mr. ADAMSON. What is the gentleman's suggestion?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman suggests that the purpose is to establish only one leprosorium?

Mr. ADAMSON. Suppose you make it no more than two.

Mr. MANN. I can not see what they would want to have two for.

Mr. ADAMSON. This is a big country, you know, and we would not want to haul them from coast to coast.

Mr. MANN. Oh, a leper in this country is no danger at all, so far as communicating disease to others by traveling is concerned.

Mr. ADAMSON. Well, the State of Massachusetts and the State of Louisiana have thought otherwise by establishing homes in those States. There is one, also, on the Pacific coast.

Mr. MANN. We had one here. I do not know what became of Mr. Early. They still have a leprosorium here, for all I know.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not think there would be any objection to limiting the number to two or three, but I think they ought to have more than one.

Mr. MANN. I do not think we ought to authorize more than one. If they need one, very well; but I am not in favor of giving a blanket authority for locating leprosoriums wherever they please, regardless of the wishes of the communities. The proper place to locate one is out in the wild somewhere, where nobody lives within a radius of many miles and where nobody ever will live.

Mr. ADAMSON. I would rather have authority to start with one than none at all. What would the gentleman suggest?

Mr. MANN. I have not any amendment prepared.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I think the bill ought to go over, if the gentleman is serious about it. I will call the gentleman's attention to what I think is an error. The bill undertakes to appropriate $250,000 for the construction of buildings, and so forth, and gives authority to use $250,000 until June 30, 1916. You could not appropriate for a building after that date, and it is quite certain you could not buy a site and build one before that date. So your authorization would not do any good if the bill should pass. That is section 5 of the bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. We can amend that, if the gentleman does not object to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. MANN. We could, as far as I am concerned, spend the afternoon on it; but I think we want to pass some other bills this afternoon.

Mr. ADAMSON. I do not think we will have any chance to pass this after to-day.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I think so. I suggest to the gentleman that he ask to have the bill passed over without prejudice. I think we will have time during the latter days of the session. Of course, this bill will not become a law at this session anyway.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, under the circumstances I am glad to oblige the gentleman by making the request that the bill go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks that the bill be passed without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

WALTER DEAN.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 20427) to authorize the sale of certain land in Alabama to Walter Dean.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this is a Private Calendar bill, but I suppose it is not the fault of the author of the bill that it is on the Union Calendar; and as we would have passed it the other night if it had been on the Private Calendar, I shall not make the point of order.

Mr. FERRIS. I thank the gentleman. It is quite important to get this fixed up at this time.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. MANN. No; I do not.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. FERRIS. I ask unaniomus consent to consider the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to consider this bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to issue a patent to Walter Dean, of Calhoun County, Ala., for the north half of section 24, township 14 south, range 7 east, Huntsville meridian in the State of Alabama: Provided, That the said Dean shall within six months from approval hereof file his application for said tract and pay the register and receiver of the land office at Montgomery, Ala., the sum of $1.25 per acre therefor.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FERRIS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

HOMESTEAD ENTRYMEN UNDER RECLAMATION PROJECTS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 19061) for the relief of homestead entrymen under the reclamation projects of the United States.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] if there are many cases that are expected to be affected or relieved by this legislation?

Mr. FERRIS. I understand there are only a few.

Mr. MONDELL. I notice that the report says there are about eight on the Uncompahgre reclamation project in Colorado and several in California. The bill is general in form, and I am not able at this time to bring myself to believe that sections 2 and 3 are necessary. It does not seem to me that there is any objection to section 1, but section 2 is a general provision. On reading it hurriedly I think it would apply to other cases than cases such as are proposed to be relieved by section 1, and I can scarcely conceive of a situation that would arise that would necessitate any such provision as section 2.

Mr. FERRIS. Did the gentleman read the letter of Mr. Sweeney, the Assistant Secretary?

Mr. MONDELL. I have read the letter of Mr. Bo Sweeney on the subject, but it does not convince me. I doubt if there is any situation that they could not meet, and I doubt if section 3 should be adopted without pretty full consideration.

Mr. FERRIS. Will not the gentleman allow it to be considered, and content himself with offering an amendment? The gentleman may be right about it. I see, however, that the report says:

Section 3 is added to meet a situation that is the source of considerable distress among settlers, for which there appears to be no remedy either in the law or in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior.

On section 2 the report says:

The provisions of section 2 are suggested to cover the circumstances where two or more entrymen who have relinquished their entries shall apply for the same farm unit. It is intended to avoid the necessity of other methods of selection as between two applications for the same farm unit, also to provide that when the number of farm units subject to entry is insufficient to afford a lien selection for each person in the situation described those open to entry shall be awarded in sequence of original entries.

That seems to be in order to determine priority, and the department thinks it is necessary to avoid other methods of selection.

Mr. MONDELL. Let me say to the gentleman that if there is any necessity for any provision of that kind, it is a necessity that arises, in the main, outside of any legislation of this sort; it is possible that there will be some such contests between applicants for the same tracts on reclamation projects generally; but where you have only 8 entrymen in one case and 15 in another to deal with, it is not at all likely that any such contingency will arise as is intended to be provided for by this section. As a general provision applying to all projects, if there is some law necessary to guide the Secretary in his discretion, we should have it; but I doubt the necessity of making any provision to guide his discretion in these cases.

Mr. BORLAND. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes

Mr. BORLAND. Sections 1 and 2 seem to have no necessary connection with section 3; but as to sections 1 and 2, the gentleman has no objection to that power being conferred on the department, has he? Where settlers have made an entry in good faith upon land withdrawn for the purpose of irrigation, and either by delay in completion of the project or change in the location of the ditches, it is found that their land is not within the irrigable area, is it not a good thing to give them the right to exchange their land for some land that is within the irrigable area?

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman point out to me the class of cases affected by section 3 that are not affected by section 1?

Mr. BORLAND. I confess I do not understand section 3. I am going to try to get some information on it.

Mr. MONDELL. I never like to vote for anything I do not understand. I do understand section 1, and I can understand that there may be a necessity for that. But I doubt the necessity of section 2 or the advisability of section 3.

Mr. BORLAND. If there were an amendment to strike out section 3, are not sections 1 and 2 applicable to the situation, and are they not a good thing to pass?

Mr. MANN. There is no necessity for section 2.

Mr. BORLAND. Probably not; I understand that is a practice of the department.

Mr. MANN. I am going to object to the bill unless sections 2 and 3 go out.

Mr. FERRIS. I think section 2 is the existing law, and I do not think section 3 would be insisted upon by the author of the bill. If the gentleman thinks that that will relieve the objection, I will agree to it.

Mr. MONDELL. I hope the gentleman will agree to strike out sections 2 and 3 because I think the relief can be had under section 1 of the bill.

Mr. FERRIS. I think there will be no objection to that. I will ask that it be done.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person who has made homestead entry under the act of June 17, 1902 (32 Stat. L., p. 388), for land susceptible of irrigation which at the time of said entry was withdrawn for any contemplated irrigation project, may relinquish the same, provided that it has since been determined that the land embraced in such entry is not or will not be irrigable under the project, and in lieu thereof may select and make entry for any farm unit included within such irrigation project as finally established, notwithstanding the provisions of section 5 of the act of June 25, 1910, entitled "An act to authorize advances to the reclamation fund," etc., and acts amendatory thereof: Provided, That such entryman shall be given credit on the new entry for the time of bona fide residence maintained on the original entry.

SEC. 2. That in case more than one application be made at the same time for the same farm unit, preference shall be given to the applicants in the order of the dates of their original entries for the lands relinquished, and if two or more such entrymen having made previous entry on the same date shall apply to enter the same farm unit at the same time in lieu thereof, the precedence shall be decided between them by lot.

SEC. 3. That any person who has heretofore established residence upon and improved any tract of land within the irrigable area of a reclamation project withdrawn from entry under the provisions of the reclamation act of June 17, 1902 (32 Stat. L., 388), and acts supplementary thereto and amendatory thereof, and who shall have made bona fide improvements upon such land, and who shall have resided thereon in good faith for two years prior to the passage of this act, may make entry for the farm unit upon which his residence is established, notwithstanding the provisions of section 5 of the act of June 25, 1910, entitled "An act to authorize advances to the reclamation fund," and so forth, and acts amendatory thereof, and the homestead entry of any entryman who has heretofore established residence upon any such tract of land and who shall have resided thereon in good faith for two years prior to the passage of this act and who has placed bona fide improvements thereon is hereby validated, but such entry shall be subject to conformation to a farm unit when established.

The following committee amendments were read:

Page 1, line 6, after the word "land," insert the words "believed to be."

Page 1, line 9, after the word "entry," insert the following: "or all thereof in excess of 20 acres."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, agreeably to the arrangement made a few moments ago, I move to strike out all of sections 2 and 3.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma moves to strike out sections 2 and 3.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FERRIS, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CANDLER AND EVANS COUNTIES, GA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 20814) to place Candler and Evans Counties, of Georgia, in the eastern division of the southern district of Georgia.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the counties of Candler and Evans, in the State of Georgia, are hereby attached to and made a part of the eastern division of the southern judicial district of said State.

The following committee amendments were read:

In line 3, after the word "Candler," insert the word "Jenkins."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended to read: "A bill to place Candler, Jenkins, and Evans Counties, Ga., in the eastern division of Georgia."

POST OFFICE AT CARLISLE, PA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 18645) for the acquisition of additional site and improvement of Federal post office at Carlisle, Pa.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any moneys in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $20,000 for the acquisition of additional land for a site and for the improvement and alteration of the Federal post office at Carlisle, Pa.

The following committee amendments were read:

Line 6, strike out the figures "$20,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$3,500."

Lines 6 and 7, strike out the words "for the acquisition of additional land for a site and."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. LOGUE. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. LOGUE. This has been amended by the committee. It is not for the acquisition of an additional site.

Mr. MANN. I know what it is for; it is to put certain things in a more attractive condition.

Mr. LOGUE. No; if the gentleman will pardon me.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not know what it is for.

Mr. LOGUE. Yes, I do; it is for the alteration and improvements of the stairway that was reported to be in an unsafe condition.

Mr. MANN. To put the stairway in a more attractive condition.

Mr. LOGUE. In a safer condition.

Mr. MANN. I am only reading from the report, which the gentleman from Pennsylvania can read; he is denying what is in the report.

Mr. LOGUE. It is to be placed in a safer and more attractive position.

Mr. MANN. That is what I said.

Mr. LOGUE. No; the gentleman stated only that it was to be put in a more attractive condition.

Mr. MANN. Here is a stairway which has just been erected, and the people do not like it because they say it does not look nice.

Mr. LOGUE. This is under the report of the department, coupled with the report of the postmaster, that several people have fallen down these stairs and that there is danger to the citizens of injury. The fact in connection with this situation is that the building was completed within the appropriation and a large sum of money was covered back into the Treasury. At that time the department should have had notice, and it has been called to their attention that these changes are needed, and the appropriation of $3,500 does not reach the limit originally made for the erection of the building. It is not an attempt to beautify it. The Representative to Congress from that district [Mr. RUPLEY] was before our committee. The report of the department was such that our committee thought that it was needed for the safety of the public and that these changes should be made.

Mr. MANN. I have read the report, and it is about as ridiculous as anybody could make it. Here is a stairway just erected, and because the patrons who are served by rural routes want to go there and get their mail, they want this stairway changed. They prefer to go there and climb these steps, but they say they do not look nice, and want somebody to build them over again.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois one question. I want to ask him if he thinks it is fair to this committee and to the House to make a statement that the report of the committee is simply to the effect that the stairway is to be changed merely to be made more attractive, when the report itself says it is to be made safer and more attractive?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman should quote what I really said.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The two are not analogous at all. When you say to make it safer and more attractive you do not mean simply to make it more attractive. The burden of the thing is, if the gentleman will read the report from the department, that this stairway is absolutely in a dangerous condition, and the main purpose of this is to make it safe. Of course it may be made a little more attractive.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Illinois yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Florida what is the nature of the defect in the stairs that makes them so unsafe?

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I understand that they are so steep that it is positively dangerous to go up and down. That is the report made to us. It is a very insignificant sum; and, besides that, I understand that the stairway is so constructed as to detract largely from the appearance of the building; that it makes it appear hideous, in other words, besides being absolutely unsafe. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RUPLEY], the Member from that district—and I believe that is his home town—came before the committee and he enlarged upon those two propositions. The main proposition, however, is the unsafe condition of the stairway, and that is why we made this report.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I had not stated what actuated the committee. I stated in the first place that the purpose of this bill was to make the stairway more attractive. Here is the report of the department:

The steps in use at the present time are not in harmony architectually with the building, and to a great extent mar its appearance. Otherwise it is a splendid structure—

And so forth. It is true they later say——

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Will not the gentleman be fair enough to read the balance of that?

Mr. MANN. I shall not take the trouble to read the three pages. I was just stating that it was true that later on they say the steps are dangerous. It is also true that they say there are handrails there and that the people will not use the handrails. Evidently the people do not think the steps are dangerous or they would use the handrails. It is perfectly patent. The department has just constructed a building and the people there do not like it. I would be very glad to have the stairway rebuilt if we had plenty of money.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit me to read a line on page 3?

Mr. MANN. So far as I am concerned, the gentleman can read it all.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. I read from the report:

It is unfortunate that the building was so designed in the first instance as to provide for a flight of entrance steps so steep as to be dangerous.

Mr. MANN. It is unfortunate. How long has this building been constructed? It has just been finished.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I did not become interested in this until I picked up this report a moment ago. I see that the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McAdoo, said in a letter on December 22, written to the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, which letter is found in the report of the committee on page 3:

The matter of the entrance steps is in a different category. It is unfortunate that the building was so designed in the first instance as to provide for a flight of entrance steps so steep as to be dangerous. Of the estimated cost of $7,500, it is believed that the cost of reconstructing the steps would amount to $3,500.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. That is what the committee recommends, and nothing more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects; and the bill is stricken from the calendar.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT HARTFORD, CONN.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 18310) to acquire a site for a public building at Hartford, Conn.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

FEDERAL BUILDING AT OAKLAND, CAL.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 21239) to increase the limit of cost of the site of a Federal building at Oakland, Cal.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have some explanation of what the amount of money appropriated in the bill—$51,750—is for?

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman that in 1912 an appropriation was made to enlarge the site of the Oakland post-office building. The owners of the property refused to accept the amount that had been appropriated and condemnation proceedings were begun by the Government. The award is $57,750 in excess of the amount appropriated. The Attorney General states that he considers this a reasonable price, and adds that if any more delay is had he fears the site can not be secured for the amount awarded. The necessity for the additional land is apparent when I state that the post-office building is now so crowded that the internal-revenue office, the customs office, and the commissioner of bankruptcy and other Federal officers are compelled to rent quarters outside of the Federal building.

Mr. BORLAND. Are we to assume that the Government went ahead with condemnation proceedings and that the verdict of the jury was for $57,750 more than the amount estimated?

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. And that is the sole cause of this?

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. And no more land was embraced?

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. No; the same land; and in the opinion of the Attorney General this is a reasonable figure; and if more delay is had, owing to the rapid increase in the values in that locality, it will unquestionably cost the Government more to acquire the property. The bill is recommended by the Treasury Department.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. This bill gives just enough so that, added to the authorization heretofore made, it completes the amount of the award.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Yes.

Mr. BORLAND. Will this complete the acquisition of the site?

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider the bill in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the limit of cost for the purchase of a Federal building site at Oakland, Cal., be, and the same is hereby, increased $51,750, or so much thereof as may be necessary to meet the additional cost of the said site.

With the following committee amendment:

Line 5, strike out the figures "$51,740" and insert the figures "$51,750."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

QUIETING TITLE TO PROPERTY, GUTHRIE, OKLA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 21200) quieting and confirming the title of the Methodist University of Oklahoma in and to certain tracts of land located in the city of Guthrie, Okla.

The Clerk read the title.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there does not seem to be very much information given in the report in this case. The bill was introduced to give a quitclaim title to the Methodist University. The amendment is to give title to the city of Guthrie.

Mr. FERRIS. Or rather to relinquish.

Mr. MANN. Is that for the benefit of the university?

Mr. FERRIS. It is intended to be given to the university.

Mr. MANN. Suppose they do not give it to the university; then what?

Mr. FERRIS. Let me state the facts concerning this case; I suppose the gentleman will be interested. Pursuant to the act of May 2, 1890, which is the general act and does not give very much light on this identical town site, there were ten and a fraction of acres of land reserved in the city of Guthrie as the Territorial capital of Oklahoma for capital purposes and for the capital city. It is called a park, but is never used as a park but for capital purposes. Later statehood came and there was added to what was originally Oklahoma the Indian Territory. The people of the adjoining Territories took a vote as to where the capital should be, and located the capital at the city of Oklahoma as distinguished from the city of Guthrie. It then left the people of Guthrie with quite a large building on their hands, and left them with 10 acres of land on their hands, and they sought as best they could to recoup their loss by reason of having the capital removed——

Mr. MANN. But what was the title the Government conveyed?

Mr. FERRIS. The Government by the act of May 2, 1890, conveyed a limited title to them.

Mr. MANN. I know; but what was that title?

Mr. FERRIS. Later on——

Mr. MANN. What was the title conveyed?

Mr. FERRIS. For park and school purposes.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no; it was conveyed for capital purposes; but what was the limitation upon the title?

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Originally it was conveyed to the town-site trustees. Afterwards, under the act of 1904, the town-site trustees conveyed it to the city of Guthrie with a limitation. In 1913 the President of the United States conveyed the second title with absolute fee without any reservation at all. Now, afterwards when this question came up, when the grant was made to the Methodist University, the Supreme Court held that the limitation of the original town-site act of 1890 applied; that the town held it in trust, so that the object of this bill is to convey title to the city, so that the city can do as it pleases.

Mr. MANN. Well, I know; but what is the city going to do with it?

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I presume, Mr. Chairman, it is the intention of the city to convey it to the university.

Mr. MANN. I really think in fairness we ought to know.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. That is the intention.

Mr. MANN. The substitute says here it is to be conveyed to the city of Guthrie. Now, the city of Guthrie has conveyed to the Methodist University this land, but did not have a good title. Now, if they convey a good title to the city of Guthrie and if the city does not choose to convey it to the Methodist University, really that university is up in the air.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I would say in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, that the deed was put in escrow and a condition imposed on the university, that they are to raise $250,000 as an endowment fund, and they are now waiting until the deeds are approved before they commence to raise that money. When the deeds are approved, they will raise the money.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD and that the substitute be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD and that the substitute be read. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the title of the Methodist University of Oklahoma in and to a certain tract of land located in the city of Guthrie, State of Oklahoma, and more particularly described as follows, to wit: A tract of land 680 feet square, containing 10.62 acres, located within that part of the city of Guthrie, Logan County, Okla., formerly known as Capitol Hill, and bounded as follows: On the north by Cleveland Avenue, on the west by Capital Boulevard, on the south by Harrison Avenue, on the east by Drexel Boulevard, designated and known on the official plat as Capital Park, and heretofore conveyed by said city of Guthrie to the Methodist University of Oklahoma by a deed executed May 16, 1913, pursuant to an election held in said city on the 9th day of May, 1913, authorizing and directing the execution of said conveyance, be, and the same is hereby, in all things quieted and confirmed, subject only to the compliance on the part of said Methodist University of Oklahoma with the terms and conditions of said conveyance.

The substitute was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That for the purpose of removing a cloud from the title to that certain tract of land located in the city of Guthrie, State of Oklahoma, and more particularly described as follows, to wit: A tract of land 680 feet square, containing 10.62 acres, located within that part of the city of Guthrie, Logan County, Okla., formerly known as Capitol Hill, and bounded as follows: On the north by Cleveland Avenue, on the west by Capitol Boulevard, on the south by Harrison Avenue, on the east by Drexel Boulevard, designated and known on the official plat as Capital Park, whatsoever right, title, or interest the United States may have in and to said tract of land by reason of escheat or otherwise, be, and the same is hereby, released and quitclaimed unto said city of Guthrie."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the substitute.

The question was taken, and the substitute was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title of the bill was amended so as to read: "A bill quieting title to a certain tract of land located in the city of Guthrie, Okla."

On motion by Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT BATH, ME.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 1702) increasing the limit of cost fixed by act of Congress approved June 25, 1910, for enlargement, extension, etc., of Federal building at Bath, Me.

The Clerk read the title.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to know who is in charge of this bill. This bill adds $10,000 to the authorization, but according to the report it seems to be for some work which was omitted when the contracts were originally let. Does the gentleman from Florida know what that work was which was omitted? The report does not state it.

Mr. CLARK of Florida. The report says:

It is estimated that an increase of $10,000 will be sufficient to complete the approach work along the lines originally contemplated and also provide for certain desirable betterment.

I do not know just exactly what it is further than that, Mr. Speaker. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. MCGILLICUDDY] came before the committee. I do not think I was present when he was there. He stated that there were a number of small things they had to cut off in order to put up the building. These things are necessary, and the committee felt it was necessary that they should be done.

Mr. BORLAND. That seems a little vague. The word "approaches," as the gentleman understands, is generally used in these bills to signify some work that is doing in the city or in the street contiguous to the site. I think it had better go over. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. MCGILLICUDDY] is not here.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. MCGILLICUDDY] is down in West Virginia at present.

Mr. BORLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask that it be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

VALIDATION OF HOMESTEAD ENTRIES.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 21122) to validate certain homestead entries.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill.

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. FERRIS. Will the gentleman hear me a minute on that?

Mr. MANN. Yes; I will reserve my objection.

Mr. FERRIS. In 1900 Congress passed an act opening certain lands to settlement. There were a lot of remnant lands left that no one wanted. After the first 60-day period anyone could take the remaining lands who would go and settle on them, and the first settler thereon got them. Two or three years went along with some activity in homesteading and a few remnant lands were still remaining. I incorporated in the Indian appropriation bill—or at least I advocated it and it was adopted—a short amendment providing for the sale of these remaining remnant lands. I thought we could close it up in that way.

Mr. MANN. What had it to do with the Indian appropriation bill? These are not Indian lands.

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, no; only it passed as other amendments that were added to the bill. It was land that had been ceded to the Government.

Mr. MANN. We supposed at that time these were Indian lands. The gentleman puts an amendment in the appropriation bill. I do not say that he led us erroneously to suppose that these were remnant lands belonging to Indians; but that is the only way that the bill would have jurisdiction over them.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman and I both know how these appropriation bills go through, and that at the Senate end they very often hang on everything in the shape of amendments.

Mr. MANN. I remember the item. I remember the impression I received on the floor that these were remnant lands belonging to the Indians and hence it was proper in the Indian appropriation bill to provide for their disposal.

Mr. FERRIS. I think the gentleman was probably incorrect, as I think this amendment went in at the Senate end, and I do not think the gentleman had any statement from me at the time. There was a question at the time as to whether or not they were Indian lands. But the department later held they were public lands and not Indian lands. This is what happened. After this amendment had passed, the local land office down at Guthrie gave out a published statement in the newspapers, and the matter was current in the State, and asked the people to come and enter these lands, and they did enter them—some 56 in number. They filed on them. A good many of them proved them up, got their receipts, and built houses on them. Last fall when I was home they had received notices by reason of the amendment in the Indian appropriation bill which provided for the sale of these land, back in 1911; that these lands had been erroneously entered and their titles were held for cancellation. I said to them that I did not believe the Government would let them go on the land and build homes and prove them up and then take the lands away from them. I called it to the attention of the Land Office, and they were willing to favor legislation to straighten it out. They think themselves that they ought not to let people enter land and live on it two or three years and then take it away from them. I introduced the bill, and the department recommended it favorably, and the committee reported it. It ought to pass. It will straighten out a tangle that should be straightened.

Mr. STAFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I will.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under the Indian appropriation provision, what prevented these settlers from purchasing these lands on which they made improvements at the appraised value?

Mr. FERRIS. The Land Office did not offer them under the 1911 provision, and they being segregated by existing entries were not subject under the 1913 provision.

Mr. STAFFORD. Were they not subject to entry under the prior act of 1911? Is not the gentleman confusing the dates?

Mr. FERRIS. That is the one I referred to. And it is that one that the land should have been sold under, and the local land office made the error and invited numerous families to come on to settle on the land. There was for a time some confusion about it as to whether or not the land was Indian land. This probably was the cause of the trouble.

Mr. STAFFORD. Under the act of 1911, which is not the appropriation act.

Mr. FERRIS. It was an amendment to the Indian appropriation bill. The act of 1911 was the Indian appropriation act.

Mr. STAFFORD. Not according to the report here.

Mr. FERRIS. It is, though.

Mr. STAFFORD. They have a right to-day to buy the lands at the appraised value, not including the improvements.

Mr. FERRIS. Oh, yes; but a man has exhausted his homestead right. A man who three or four years ago was invited to go and enter on the land and build a house on it and cultivate it and comply with the homestead law, and even prove up on it, does not want to give it up. He is entitled to it. He should not be compelled to buy it a second time.

Mr. STAFFORD. The gentleman's statement is not correct when he says he is deprived of his entire right, because he is not. He can purchase this land at the appraised value, not including the improvements. He does not wish to buy at the appraised value.

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman should not say I am in error. I know it from A to Z. There were two amendments in the appropriation bill under which the department could sell the land. Later I came along and put a provision in the appropriation bill in 1913 authorizing that they sell and clean up these remnant lands. I want to get rid of them and get rid of any trouble of this kind.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERRIS. I was first trying to satisfy the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. These lands in the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indian Reservations that originally were authorized to be disposed of were sold, were they not, to the highest bidder—that is, under sealed bids?

Mr. FERRIS. This first opening was not; no. The first opening was ceded lands, and they had a general drawing. These are lands that were carried over from that first opening. The latter opening was under the 1906 opening.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. From the original opening?

Mr. FERRIS. Yes.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Did the Indian appropriation act contain an item for the disposition of remnant lands, or did it not apply to reserve tracts that had been used for schools and agency purposes?

Mr. FERRIS. The last act more particularly did. There were two acts. An amendment was placed in the Indian appropriation act for 1911 which provided that the Secretary of the Interior was authorized to sell the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache lands. They did not sell them, but on the contrary the local land office people went out and invited people to settle them by homestead entry.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. They were open to homestead entry before that act was passed, and did not that act withdraw them from homestead entry?

Mr. FERRIS. I believe it did, and they held that they can not prevent these people from entering, even if they have entered or already have gotten title. I present herewith the report on the bill from the Public Lands Committee. It also contains the views of the department. It is as follows:

[House of Representatives, Rept. No. 1367, 63d Cong., 3d sess.]

VALIDATING CERTAIN HOMESTEAD ENTRIES.

Mr. FERRIS, from the Committee on the Public Lands, submitted the following report.

The Committee on the Public Lands, having had under consideration H. R. 21122, entitled "A bill to validate certain homestead entries," after carefully considering the same, reports the bill back to the House with the recommendation that the same do pass with the following amendment added thereto:

"Provided, That in addition to the land-office fees prescribed by statute for such entries the entryman shall pay $1.25 per acre for the land entered at the time of submitting final or commutation proof."

The bill is short, and is therefore printed herewith at length, with the provision added thereto, which is strictly in accord with the recommendation of the Interior Department, and as it was unanimously approved by the committee. It is as follows:

"A bill to validate certain homestead entries.

"Be it enacted, etc., That all homestead entries heretofore erroneously allowed for the unused, unallotted, and unreserved lands of the United States in the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indian Reservations, which lands were authorized to be sold under section 16 of the act approved March 3, 1911 (36 Stat. L., p. 1069), and under the provisions of the act approved June 30, 1913 (38 Stat. L., p. 92), are hereby ratified and confirmed: Provided, That in addition to the land-office fees prescribed by statute for such entries the entryman shall pay $1.25 per acre for the land entered at the time of submitting final or commutation proof."

The bill was regularly referred to the Interior Department by the Public Lands Committee for report and recommendation. The department, under date of January 26, 1915, rendered a favorable report thereon and it is printed herewith at length, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, January 26, 1915.

Hon. SCOTT FERRIS,
Chairman Committee on the Public Lands,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. FERRIS: I have before me for consideration H. R. 21122, which provides:

"That all homestead entries heretofore erroneously allowed for the unused, unallotted, and unreserved lands of the United States in the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indian Reservations, which lands were authorized to be sold under section 16 of the act approved March 3, 1911 (36 Stat. L., 10069), and under the provisions of the act approved June 30, 1913 (38 Stat. L., 92), are hereby ratified and confirmed."

These, with other lands, were ceded to the United States by the Indian tribes named by treaty of October 21, 1892, and, with the exception of certain reservations, were made subject to entry at $1.25 per acre by the act of June 6, 1900 (31 Stat., 680).

The act of March 3, 1911 (36 Stat., 1096), authorized the Secretary of the Interior to sell such lands as remained then undisposed of upon such terms and under such rules as he might prescribe. After the passage of the last-named act the Commissioner of the General Land Office on April 29, 1911, instructed the register and receiver to allow no more entries for such lands until further notice. However, the register and receiver did allow about 56 entries to be made, 12 of which have been passed to patent.

In the Indian appropriation act of June 30, 1913 (38 Stat., 92), which further authorized the sale of the unused, unallotted, and unreserved lands in the reservations mentioned, it was provided that the Secretary of the Interior might "grant to settlers a preference right to purchase for 90 days from and after notice, at the appraised price, exclusive of improvements, such lands as are occupied by such settlers in good faith on January 1, 1913."

It is pointed out on behalf of the 56 entrymen that they occupy a different status from the settlers described in the act last cited in that the settlers went upon the land of their own accord and were not misled by the allowance of their claims by the register and receiver, whereas the 56 entrymen in question were misled by the allowance of their homestead entries, and, relying thereupon, constructed houses and other improvements upon the land, secured loans from banks, and took other steps in reliance upon the allowance of their said entries.

Under the circumstances, and as the entrymen were misled by the erroneous action of the Government officers, it is the opinion of the department that they are entitled to relief. While H. R. 21122 is apparently designed to permit the perfection of the entries in the same manner and at the same price as entries allowed under the act of June 6, 1900, supra, it is believed that in order to make this clear there should be added a proviso to the following effect:

"Provided, That in addition to the land-office fees prescribed by statute for such entries, the entrymen shall pay $1.25 per acre for the land entered at the time of submitting final or commutation proof."

So amended, the department recommends the enactment of the bill.

Very truly, yours,

A. A. JONES,
First Assistant Secretary.

The bill relates to 56 homestead entries which were allowed by the Guthrie local land office to be erroneously made. Notices were published by the land office inviting settlers to take up certain remnant lands which were left after two preceding openings had been held. Under this invitation and these notices 56 entries were made during the year 1912. Twelve of the entries have been passed to patent, the entrymen having entered promptly, resided upon the lands, proved up, and received final certificate thereto, in some cases loans having been made thereon. The other 44 entries were regularly made pursuant to the invitation issued by the local land office. The entrymen improved the land, constructed dwellings and buildings thereon, made the land more valuable, and in every way complied with the homestead laws. Later it was discovered that the lands, technically, were not subject to entry, and each of the 56 settlers were called upon to show cause why their entries should not be canceled. The land office is without power, technically, under the law to render these homesteaders relief. Certainly they are entitled to relief. To grant them this relief would not divest the Indians of any money or property, the lands having heretofore been ceded to the Government. In order to secure this relief the settlers would be required to pay $1.25 per acre for the land, the Government price for nonmineral, nonirrigable, nontimbered lands. The lands mentioned are remnant odds and ends of little value which were left over from preceding openings and are nontimbered, nonirrigable, and nonmineral.

It is thought that the only honorable thing for the Government to do in this instance is to allow their entries to stand of record, permit the homesteaders to acquire title to the lands in strict compliance with the law, and it is therefore the recommendation of your committee that this bill do pass and the relief be granted.

It may not be out of place to say that from the year 1901 up until March 3, 1911, these lands were subject to homestead entry and were not taken or selected, and it is the thought of your committee that the bill does not in any way work a hardship upon the Government; that the Indians' rights were formerly entirely severed from these lands by the treaty of October 21, 1892; that the settlers entered upon the lands in good faith and in strict accord with the invitation of the Government; that they have complied with the homestead laws—have placed improvements on the lands; that the rights of innocent persons have entered into the matter; and that these settlers are entitled to the relief mentioned.

Mr. MANN. Well, two years ago the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. FERRIS] put a provision on a bill authorizing them to sell the land and giving the settlers the right to buy them at the appraised value.

Mr. FERRIS. That is true; but I did not intend it to be construed in that way.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. FERRIS. Would the gentleman from Illinois object to its retaining its place on the calendar?

Mr. MANN. Not at all.

Mr. FERRIS. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to passing over the bill without prejudice?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

CHICOT AND DESHA COUNTIES, ARK.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 18086) to amend section 71 of an act entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," approved March 4, 1911.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, this transfers two counties from one district to another?

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. That is all. It transfers two counties from one district to another.

Mr. MANN. I understand; but was the convenience of the United States considered in any way? There is no report here or anything to indicate that this matter was ever submitted to the Attorney General or to the United States district attorney or to the district attorney for a report. It is usual to do that.

Mr FLOYD of Arkansas. Well, it is more convenient to the people of those two counties, and I know of no objection to it from any source. It takes two counties that lie along the Mississippi River and where railroad communication is direct with Helena and transfers them from the Little Rock district, which is far more remote, to Helena.

Mr. MANN. I know that recently we passed a law dividing the State into districts—or a reenactment of the law—and it is customary when these cases are up to consult the officials, so that we shall have information before us.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. I will state to the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Speaker, that in this case it is the same trial judge that holds the courts.

Mr. MANN. That is all the more reason why we should have asked him whether this is a proper transfer, so that we would have his opinion on the subject. However, I am not going to object, although I think this is a pretty loose way to do business.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 71 of an act approved March 4, 1911, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary," be, and the same is hereby, amended as relates to the eastern district of the State of Arkansas, so that when amended it shall read as follows:

"The State of Arkansas is divided into two districts, to be known as the eastern and western districts of Arkansas. The western district shall include the territory embraced on the 1st day of July, 1910, in the counties of Sevier, Howard, Little River, Pike, Hempstead, Miller, Lafayette, Columbia, Nevada, Ouachita, Union, and Calhoun, which shall constitute the Texarkana division of said district; also the territory embraced on the date last mentioned in the counties of Polk, Scott, Yell, Logan, Sebastian, Franklin, Crawford, Washington, Benton, and Johnson, which shall constitute the Fort Smith division of said district; also the territory embraced on the date last mentioned in the counties of Baxter, Boone, Carroll, Madison, Marion, Newton, and Searcy, which shall constitute the Harrison division of said district. Terms of the district court for the Texarkana division shall be held at Texarkana on the second Mondays in May and November; for the Fort Smith division, at Fort Smith on the second Mondays in January and June; and for the Harrison division, at Harrison, on the second Mondays in April and October. The eastern district shall include the territory embraced on the 1st day of July, 1910, in the counties of Lee, Phillips, St. Francis, Cross, Monroe, Woodruff, Chicot, and Desha, which shall constitute the eastern division of said district; also the territory embraced on the date last mentioned in the counties of Independence, Cleburne, Stone, Izard, Sharp, and Jackson, which shall constitute the northern division of said district; also the territory embraced on the date last mentioned in the counties of Crittenden, Clay, Craighead, Greene, Mississippi, Poinsett, Fulton, Randolph, and Lawrence, which shall constitute the Jonesboro division of said district; and also the territory embraced on the date last mentioned in the counties of Arkansas, Ashley, Bradley, Clark, Cleveland, Conway, Dallas, Drew, Faulkner, Garland, Grant, Hot Spring, Jefferson, Lincoln, Lonoke, Montgomery, Perry, Pope, Prairie, Pulaski, Saline, Van Buren, and White, which shall constitute the western division of said district. Terms of the district court for the eastern division shall be held at Helena on the second Monday in March and the first Monday in October; for the northern division at Batesville on the fourth Monday in May and the second Monday in December; for the Jonesboro division, at Jonesboro on the second Mondays in May and November; and for the western division, at Little Rock on the first Monday in April and the third Monday in October. The clerk of the court for the eastern district shall maintain an office in charge of himself or a deputy at Little Rock, at Helena, at Jonesboro, and at Batesville, which shall be kept open at all times for the transaction of the business of the court, and the clerk of the court for the western district shall maintain an office in charge of himself or a deputy at Fort Smith, at Harrison, and at Texarkana, which shall be kept open at all times for the transaction of the business of the court."

SEC. 2. That all laws and parts of laws in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

FOUNDATION FOR THE PROMOTION OF INDUSTRIAL PEACE.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 21236) to dissolve the Foundation for the Promotion of Industrial Peace, and for other purposes.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and the bill is stricken from the Calendar. The Clerk will report the next one.

CRATER NATIONAL PARK REVENUE FUND.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 2223) to authorize the use of the revenues in the Crater Lake National Park in the management of the same, and the construction, repair, and improvement of roads, trails, and bridges in the park.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I reserve the right to object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, this bill is one designed to give to the Secretary of the Interior authority to expend the receipts coming from leases, franchises, and licenses in Crater Lake Park, Oreg., in the improvement of the park. The bill was drawn in the office of the Secretary, and he states that the Crater Lake Park and the Mesa Verde Park, in Colorado, are the only parks under his supervision where he has not the authority to expend the funds in the management of the parks. It can readily be seen that this park ought to be placed on the same footing with the other parks with regard to expending the revenues of the park upon the park.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, for just a moment, I am not in sympathy with the purpose of the bill, but it would not accomplish the purpose which it is designed to accomplish if it were enacted.

It only shows how carelessly rough some bills are sent to us from the various departments. The language of the bill was originally prepared and sent as an estimate to go into the sundry civil appropriation bill. The sundry civil bill contains an appropriating clause at the beginning of the bill, and it would have appropriated, if this item had been inserted in the sundry civil bill, the receipts referred to in this bill.

But there is no appropriation at all in this bill. All that this bill would accomplish would be to do what is now done—to turn the money into the Treasury, as is now the case, and when the money is once in the Treasury there is no way of getting it out without an appropriation, and there is no appropriation in this bill. In order that it may be properly corrected, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and the bill is stricken from the calendar. The Clerk will report the next one.

GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 3897) to authorize the Great Northern Railway Co. to revise the location of its right of way, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. COOPER. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I should like to hear a statement of the purport of the bill.

Mr. STOUT. I have no particular statement to make, further than that made in the report. It is desired to eliminate a very heavy grade at the point referred to in the bill. The length of the right of way which is sought to be abandoned is something less than 2 miles. The length of the right of way which is desired by this bill is something in excess of a mile. It cuts out a wide curve. The railroad forms the southern boundary of Glacier National Park. The bill provides that the land which is left between the old and the new rights of way shall be added to the national park, in order that the line of the railway shall continue to constitute the southern boundary of the park.

Mr. COOPER. I do not quite understand the last paragraph of the report. Is this bill as now presented the bill recommended by the department?

Mr. STOUT. It is.

Mr. COOPER. It differs from the Senate bill?

Mr. STOUT. The bill recommended by the department is substituted for the original Senate bill.

Mr. COOPER. The report says the committee have had the bill under consideration, but there is no statement in the report that that is the bill reported by the committee.

Mr. STOUT. It is the bill submitted by the department in lieu of the original bill as introduced.

Mr. COOPER. So this is the amendment of the Department of the Interior?

Mr. STOUT. Yes; it is.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection?

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. STOUT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Montana asks unanimous consent to consider the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, with the consent and approval of the Secretary of the Interior and upon the filing with the Interior Department and the approval thereof by said Secretary of maps of definite location, the Great Northern Railway Co., a corporation of the State of Minnesota, be, and it is hereby, authorized to revise the location of that part of its line of railway along the southern boundary of the Glacier National Park, in the State of Montana, on the terms and conditions and subject to the limitations and restrictions granted by and contained in an act of Congress entitled "An act granting to railroads the right of way through the public lands of the United States," approved March 3, 1875 (18 Stats., p. 482), as amended by an act of Congress entitled "An act making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1899, and for prior years, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1899 (30 Stats., p. 1233): Provided, That all lands north of the north line of the revised right of way, when said revised line of right of way shall have been approved as aforesaid, shall be excluded from the Lewis and Clark National Forest and become and remain part of the Glacier National Park, and be subject to all the provisions of an act of Congress entitled "An act to establish 'the Glacier National Park' in the Rocky Mountains south of the international boundary line in the State of Montana, and for other purposes," approved May 11, 1910 (36 Stats., p. 354), and to all the provisions of any act of Congress that may hereafter be passed relative to said park, and the regulations of the Secretary of the Interior heretofore or hereafter prescribed in accordance with law for the government of the park, and that any and all lands south of the north line of such revised line of right of way which may now be within the Glacier National Park shall become and remain a part of the Lewis and Clark National Forest and be subject to and be governed by the laws heretofore or hereafter enacted by Congress and the regulations heretofore or hereafter prescribed by the Secretary of Agriculture for the control of national forests.

With the following committee amendments:

Insert, on page 1, in line 6, after the word "location," the words "within three years from the passage of this act."

Add, at the end of the last paragraph on page 3, the following: "Provided further, That before the Secretary of the Interior shall consent to and approve the revision of location herein authorized the said Great Northern Railway Co. shall file with the said Secretary a relinquishment of all claims, of whatever nature, to that portion of its right of way affected by said revised location."

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. STOUT, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

CERTAIN TOWN SITES IN MONTANA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 20498) to validate title to certain town sites in the State of Montana.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask if Mr. Tallman represents the railroad company?

Mr. STOUT. He does not.

Mr. MANN. This is a private speculation of his own?

Mr. STOUT. He is just a private individual.

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and the bill is stricken from the calendar.

WESTERN DISTRICT OF SOUTH CAROLINA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 20894) to provide for the appointment of a district judge, district attorney, and marshal for the western district of South Carolina, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects, and the bill will be stricken from the calendar.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman from Illinois to withhold his objection.

Mr. MANN. Certainly; I reserve the objection.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, this proposed legislation is necessary. In my State we have over 1,800,000 population and only one district judge. While it is true that there is a circuit judge who is appointed from that State, he does not hold any courts in South Carolina. His time is taken up with his other duties.

I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that this bill has passed one House or the other three times. I think it has passed both Houses twice.

Mr. MANN. When did it pass this House?

Mr. FINLEY. In the Fifty-seventh Congress a substantially similar bill passed.

Mr. MANN. That was 14 years ago, and they have gotten along very well from that time up to date, and nobody even reintroduced the bill, I think.

Mr. FINLEY. Oh, no; I beg the gentleman's pardon. The bill has been here in each Congress.

Mr. MANN. It has not been reported. I think in the present state of the Treasury they can get along for at least another year.

Mr. FINLEY. This bill was vetoed once by the President, on the ground that we did not provide a district judge. Every State in the Union of anything like the size of South Carolina that has two districts has two separate sets of court officials.

Mr. MANN. When was this bill vetoed by the President?

Mr. FINLEY. It was vetoed by President Roosevelt in the Fifty-seventh Congress.

Mr. MANN. And they have gotten along very well since then.

Mr. FINLEY. No; the bill passed again in the Fifty-eighth Congress. I will suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that the report is short——

Mr. MANN. I have read the report. I remember the case.

Mr. FINLEY. I will say to the gentleman that this district judge is one of the most industrious judges on the bench in this country. I do not know what he says about it, but some of his friends are anxious about him, because he has more work than he should do. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will not object.

Mr. MANN. I do not think this is a very good time to create another judgeship.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CULLOP. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] objects, and the bill is stricken from the calendar.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT BIDDEFORD, ME.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 6134) to amend the act authorizing the construction of a public building at Biddeford, Me.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FOSTER. I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois objects. The bill is stricken from the calendar. This completes the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

Mr. ADAMSON. There are two uncontested bridge bills which were reported too late to get onto this calendar. I hope no one will object to allowing me to ask unanimous consent for their consideration at this time. They will take only a moment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of two bridge bills. Is there objection?

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the House is entitled to know what business is to come up for consideration. These are not emergency measures, and therefore I object.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. RAGSDALE. I object.

ACADEMY OF ARTS AND LETTERS.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and discharge the Committee on the Library from further consideration of S. 583, incorporating the American Academy of Arts and Letters, and to pass the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves to suspend the rules, discharge the Committee on the Library from further consideration of S. 583, and pass the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That William Dean Howells, of New York; Henry James, of Massachusetts; Henry Adams, of the District of Columbia; Thomas Raynesford Lounsbury, of Connecticut; Theodore Roosevelt, of New York; John Singer Sargent, of Massachusetts; Alfred Thayer Mahan, of New York; Daniel Chester French, of New York; John Burroughs, of New York; James Ford Rhodes, of Massachusetts; Horatio William Parker, of Connecticut; William Milligan Sloane, of New Jersey; Robert Underwood Johnson, of New York; George Washington Cable, of Massachusetts; Andrew Dickson White, of New York; Henry van Dyke, of New Jersey; William Crary Brownell, of New York; Basil Lanneau Gildersleeve, of Maryland; Woodrow Wilson, of New Jersey; Arthur Twining Hadley, of Connecticut; HENRY CABOT LODGE, of Massachusetts; Francis Hopkinson Smith, of New York; Edwin Howland Blashfield, of New York; William Merritt Chase, of New York; Thomas Hastings, of New York; Hamilton Wright Mabie, of New Jersey; Brander Matthews, of New York; Thomas Nelson Page, of the District of Columbia; Elihu Vedder, of Massachusetts; George Edward Woodberry, of Massachusetts; Kenyon Cox, of New York; George Whitefield Chadwick, of Massachusetts; Abbott Handerson Thayer, of New Hampshire; John Muir, of California; Charles Francis Adams, of Massachusetts; Henry Mills Alden, of New Jersey; George de Forest Brush, of New Hampshire; William Rutherford Mead, of New York; John White Alexander, of New York; Bliss Perry, of Massachusetts; Abbott Lawrence Lowell, of Massachusetts; James Whitcomb Riley, of Indiana; Nicholas Murray Butler, of New York; Paul Wayland Bartlett, of New York; Owen Wister, of Pennsylvania; Herbert Adams, of New Hampshire; Augustus Thomas, of New York; Timothy Cole, of New York, and their successors, duly chosen, are hereby incorporated, constituted, and declared to be a body corporate of the District of Columbia, by the name of the American Academy of Arts and Letters.

SEC. 2. That the purposes of this corporation are and shall be the furtherance of the interests of literature and the fine arts.

SEC. 3. That the American Academy of Arts and Letters shall consist of not more than 50 regular members, and the said corporation hereby constituted shall have power to make by-laws and rules and regulations; to fill all vacancies created by death, resignation, or otherwise; to provide for the election of foreign, domestic, or honorary associate members, and the division of such members into classes; and to do all other matters needful or usual in such institutions.

SEC. 4. That the American Academy of Arts and Letters shall hold an annual meeting at such place in the United States as may be designated and shall make an annual report to the Congress, to be filed with the Librarian of Congress.

SEC. 5. That the American Academy of Arts and Letters be, and the same is hereby, authorized and empowered to receive bequests and donations of real or personal property and to hold the same in trust, and to invest and reinvest the same for the purpose of furthering the interests of literature and the fine arts.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded on this bill?

Mr. STAFFORD. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, I have had this bill up once on the Unanimous Consent Calendar, and ran against an objection. It is a bill that proposes to charter the American Academy of Arts and Letters, an association of gentlemen distinguished in the profession of letters, in painting, in sculpture, and the other fine arts. The only objection that I have heard advanced by any gentleman is that some gentlemen say they are opposed to granting charters.

In reply to that I call attention to the fact that it has been done. I have here a list of 15 or 20 associations to which charters have been granted by the Congress of the United States. Several of these are within the last 10 years. One was in 1912, the Naval History Society; and another in 1912, the American Numismatic Association. There is quite a list of them, too numerous to call attention to in detail, and I can see no reason, Mr. Speaker, why, if charters were granted to these associations, it should not be granted to the one which makes the request, which consists of some of the most eminent men in the country.

Another objection that has been sometimes urged by some gentlemen is that it is sectional. Mr. Speaker, that is not true. The bulk of these gentlemen do live in New York and in the East, and that is not an unreasonable thing under the circumstances. They came from all over the country originally, but the market for their wares is in New York and Boston, and they do like a mechanic or a lawyer or a merchant would under like circumstances—they go to the market in which they will thrive and in which their profession has the greatest recognition.

I call attention to the fact, in reply to the charge that it is sectional, that 10 of these gentlemen come from New York City, 8 from Boston, 2 from Cambridge, 1 from Beverly, 1 from Lowell, and 1 from Williamstown, 10 from Connecticut, Vermont, and New Hampshire, 8 from Ohio, 4 from Indiana, 1 from Michigan, 8 from Pennsylvania, 2 from New Jersey, and so on; 11 of these gentlemen, while living mostly in the East, were born in the South.

Mr. Speaker, there is nothing in the charge that this association is in any respect sectional. Now I will yield to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MILLER].

Mr. MILLER. How was this list of distinguished men arrived at?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Originally it was a volunteer association.

Mr. MILLER. Does not the gentleman think it is most unfortunate that these are all practically eastern men and no one west of the Allegheny Mountains except two?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Since its organization there have been people from west of the Allegheny Mountains, some of the most eminent in the country among its members. Samuel L. Clemens, better known perhaps as Mark Twain, was a member of the association, and he lived the first half of his life not only west of the Alleghenies, but largely west of the Rocky Mountains. James Whitcomb Riley, of Indiana, and John Muir, of California, who is now dead, were from the West.

Mr. MILLER. I am not opposed to the bill; I am in favor of it; but is it not possible to get some recognition for American arts and letters, and not localize it all in New York and Massachusetts?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I am glad that the gentleman is going to support the measure, but his statement that this localizes it in New York and Massachusetts is inaccurate. I have no affiliation with New York, although I go to New York and Boston occasionally and pay a pretty big hotel bill and meet some agreeable people, but that is all of my connection with that section.

Mr. COOPER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. COOPER. George Washington Cable, of Massachusetts, was born in Louisiana.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. MILLER. I know that many of these individuals were born in the West, where the best people are born, but they have gravitated to the East.

Mr. AUSTIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. AUSTIN. I do not see a resident of the Southern States south of the Potomac River in this list of individuals.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I will say to my colleague from the South—and he can not regret it any more than I do—that at this time the most eminent men in arts and letters are not residents of the South. They do not live there. I have spent all my life in the South; I am a southern man. My sympathies are all with the South, my hopes are for the South, my pride is in the South; but on account of the great Civil War, the poverty and distress which it brought upon us, the sacrifices we were called upon to make, the high-class schools of training in arts and letters have been lacking in that section.

But, Mr. Speaker, we are coming into our own in that respect. We have produced a number of distinguished men in the last few years in art and letters, in painting and sculpture, and because these men go from the South where their services are not so much required, for the reason that we have not the wealth or demand for works of art of the higher order, to those communities in which there is a better and more remunerative demand for their services we ought not to deny them the privilege of associating themselves in this way. This association is an inspiration to men who work in the arts. It is educational. It is not sectional. It is open to any man who does such work as to command the respect and admiration of his fellow citizens, who are qualified to pass on these things. Frankly, Mr. Speaker, I would not be qualified to say who is so eminent a sculptor, who so distinguished a painter, who such a master in letters, that he is entitled to belong to an association which devotes itself entirely to the development of those arts. We have produced poets and fiction writers, historians and philosophers, and they have been recognized. Some of them are in this list.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does not my colleague think it is possible he might be mistaken in the statement there are no eminent men from the Southern States——

Mr. SLAYDEN. Oh, I did not say that.
